Was there anything beyond the three months? - I don't recall seeing him again and I don't recall having discussed it, but I suspect I would have made some other effort before the mark of "No Pro." through someone else finally, to ensure there were no further matters Mr. Taylor wanted to bring back to me.

Do you remember whether there was any discussion with him about the circumstances in which he either ought or ought not to bring further reports back to you? - No.

he would suggest, and I think it is contained in the report, that there were other potential witnesses who might have been going to be seen at that stage, and other information, and it may have been we had some discussion on saying "Look, if that's the information and it's all of an identical description and there's no additional information or there's no clearer character of a criminal offence, then I would not be giving a different decision", but that if there was something different, then I would be prepared to look at that again.

Do/

Do you remember if that happened? - I can't remember in detail that a discussion of that nature took place, but it would have been something that I would have normally discussed with an officer who was clearly concerned, a report, saying "I am saying no just now, but by all means come back to me if there is something else".

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. CAMPBELL: Did Mr. Taylor explain his purpose in appending to the report information relating to the 1991 investigation by Detective Sergeant Hughes? - As I recall it, I think he explained that this was a concern in relation to a person that the police had already had some dealings with, and in order that I could understand as fully as possible the background I think he brought the additional information with him.

Did he explain why he considered it relevant to make sure you had that additional background available to you, or did you appreciate why he was doing that? - The understanding, I think -- I don't recall any detailed discussion about it -- would have been in terms of saying "This is a complete picture which you should have. This is an earlier report that another officer in this area had previously reported".

Did you read that earlier report? - Inasmuch as it was contained within this report, yes.

For example, at page four of the earlier report we see halfway down the page "In view of the concerns expressed by the witness Emslie, the accused was asked at this stage to hand over all photographic equipment that he had with him at the camp for inspection purposes. Whilst he handed over a video camera and a number of other cameras, he maintained that no still photographs had been taken during the course of the camp to date and handed over no photographs or undeveloped film at that time to the witness Kirk"? - Yes.

Am I right in understanding that subsequent investigation showed that indeed photographs had been taken and turned up later? - Yes./

Yes, I think that is correct, in relation to the earlier report.

So we have a history of obstruction in the police investigation in that regard? - Well, you have a history which indicates that the person has not previously been as forthcoming or as demonstrative in relation to material that they had, yes.

Is it common for police officers to attend personally upon the Procurator-Fiscal when sending a report in? - It varies according to the area of the country. In Stirling it was not that uncommon.

What does that mean? Can you give us some indication? - I would expect a police officer to bring a report directly in a smaller area generally, where it is a more manageable area. Stirling is fortunate in having Police Headquarters and the police offices in close proximity to the Procurator-Fiscal's Office.

Yes? - It is difficult to give you an estimate of a figure, because it would not be a run-of-the-mill case, it would not be a general type of report case, it would be something specific.

Yes? - There may well be a police officer choosing to come down and discuss something like that once, twice a month, maybe something like that; whereas in a bigger area it might be more difficult for the officer concerned to come and report to a particular Fiscal.

Would that tend to tell you anything about the officer's approach to the matter in hand? - It would indicate clearly he was interested in the report or wanted to obtain an urgent decision about the matter, or it was a particular area he wanted to explain. Perhaps there was an urgency to it, or perhaps the report has not been typed fully or the officer might want to give further information.

In your evidence-in-chief you say the officer was clearly concerned about the report? - Yes.

So/

So that would tend to indicate concern by the officer about the report? - The fact he did go through the process of bringing the report down and also the fact we had a lengthy discussion on it --

We have had the benefit of a report which has been prepared by Mr. Vannet, who I take it you would meet at some earlier stage in connection with this? - Yes.

I'm not going to take you through the details of that report, but amongst other things we are told that "Mr. Gallagher does not now recollect details of the discussion with the reporting officer"; is that true? - Yes. I don't remember the detail word for word, what was said.

We are told that "Mr. Gallagher's recollection is that he was concentrating on whether some form of indecency was going on"? - Yes.

Is that true? - Yes.

MR. CAMPBELL: Sir, I am unable to frame any further question without transgressing your lordship's ruling.

LORD CULLEN: I also bear in mind what you said earlier about what your intentions were.

No further cross-examination.

RE-EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMOY: The 1991 circumstances would be well-known to you? - Yes.

You indeed marked the 1991 case? - Yes. I think the 1991 case had initially been considered by another Procurator-Fiscal, but when the final marking was put on it I think it was myself who marked it.

And at that stage had you also seen the document attached to this AD2a? - Yes, because it formed part of this original report.

MR. BONOMOY: Sir, I am conscious of the hour. However, in my submission it would be unfortunate to leave matters today, and it would be rather inconsistent. What I propose is at this stage Mr. Lake should read Mr. Vannet's report. On reflection,/ reflection, I think it should be read in its entirety, subject to the omission of references to specific named complainers or witnesses or indeed potential accused who are named in the report.

LORD CULLEN: Do parties have any views about that? Carry on, Mr. Lake.

MR. LAKE: "Introduction. General. On 22nd April, 1996 I was directed by the Crown Agent on behalf of the Lord Advocate to review the various reports concerning Thomas Hamilton made by Police to Procurators-Fiscal and to report thereon.

"I ascertained that reports and subject sheets had been submitted by Strathclyde Police and Central Scotland Police to the Procurators-Fiscal at Dumbarton and Stirling. I have been furnished with copies of these reports which have been recovered and have had access to the originals of two of them. In the course of my enquiries I have recovered from the Regional Procurator-Fiscal of North Strathclyde at Paisley a Report prepared by Inspector Keenan of Central Scotland Police in connection with a complaint against the police by Thomas Watt Hamilton. That Report was submitted to the Regional Procurator-Fiscal by the Deputy Chief Constable of Strathclyde Police in June, 1989 and concerned the investigation of complaints by Hamilton in relation to the police enquiries the previous summer into the camp at Inchmoan Island, Loch Lomond.

"I have interviewed Mr. James Cardle, formerly the Procurator-Fiscal at Dumbarton and now retired, Mr. Keith Valentine, formerly Procurator-Fiscal at Stirling and also now retired, Mr. William Gallagher, formerly Procurator-Fiscal Depute at Stirling and now Assistant Solicitor, Crown Office and Mr. Robert Lees, formerly Regional Procurator-Fiscal of North Strathclyde at Paisley and now of Lothian and Borders at Edinburgh. I am grateful to them for the information which they were able to provide. It is of note that they all remembered the particular reports they dealt with and that without resort to the papers at the outset of the interviews had a good recollection of them. All had been concerned at the subject matters of the report, and had given them anxious consideration.

"In the course of my enquiries no further reports/reports have come to light, been drawn to my attention or been referred to by those to whom I have spoken. Further, on enquiring, I have been advised by the Crown Office that no trace can be found of any reports to or correspondence with that office concerning Thomas Hamilton.

"The reports. I have considered the following four reports or subject sheets which have been recovered, namely:-

Report 1. Strathclyde Police -- Subject Sheet dated 30th August, 1988 by Detective Sergeant Ian McBain submitted to the Procurator-Fiscal, Dumbarton and headed:- 'Complaints received by Police in relation to summer camp held on Island of Inchmoan on Loch Lomond';

Report 2. Central Scotland Police -- Copy Police Report against Thomas Watt Hamilton submitted to the Procurator-Fiscal, Stirling in September, 1991 by Detective Sergeant Paul Hughes;

Report 3. Central Scotland Police -- Copy Subject Sheet dated 3rd July, 1992 from Sergeant J. Fleming, Dunblane to the Chief Superintendent, A Division (copied to the Procurator-Fiscal, Stirling and Reporter to the Children's Panel) and headed:- 'Youth Camp at Dunblane High School run by Thomas Hamilton'; Report 4. Central Scotland Police -- Subject Sheet dated 9th June, 1993 from Detective Constable Taylor CPU Bannockburn to Detective Superintendent, Crime Management Services and subsequently submitted to the Procurator-Fiscal, Stirling and headed: 'Thomas Watt Hamilton (39) born 10.5.52 at Glasgow, unemployed 7 Kent Road, Stirling'.

"I have also had regard to the very full Central Scotland Police report dated 22nd May, 1989 into Hamilton's complaint against the police arising from police enquiries into the 1988 Inchmoan Island camp. The Report was prepared by Inspector Keenan and submitted to the Deputy Chief Constable of Strathclyde Police. I shall refer to it as Report 1A.

"Report 1. Description. This takes the format of a police Subject Sheet rather than a crime report,/" report, although the Subject Sheet was submitted together with full statements from 16 of the boys attending the camp, statements from some of the parents and statements from persons, both parents and police officers, who had visited the camp. Also included were copies of circular letters to parents from Hamilton and a copy of a letter to him from Luss Estates Company.

"The police involvement commenced on 17th July, 1988 after police at Alexandria received a complaint about the running of the camp. Initial enquiries were made and expressions of concern were received from several parents. On 21st July the police contacted 10 sets of parents of boys at the camp and put in place arrangements for them to meet their sons at Dumbarton Police Office and ascertain from them direct whether there were grounds for concern or complaint. Six out of the 10 sets of parents took advantage of this arrangement. None of the boys made any complaint at this time. Four refused to leave the camp. Several felt homesick and were taken home, in some cases reluctantly, by their parents. Hamilton was present, and spoke with all the parents. None was prepared to make complaint, and indeed some praised him.

"The Subject Sheet does not summarise the contents of the statements. However, it does record Hamilton's position in the matter. He informed the police of the 'qualifications' to run such a camp and his lengthy experience in doing so -- this being, according to him, his 55th camp in 15 years. He expressed some concern about the complaints, but maintained he was not acting improperly. He appears to have been quite frank with Detective Sergeant McBain, admitting that he had struck some of the children, but maintaining that this had been done in the course of disciplining the boys. He indicated that a number of the boys were bullies, disruptive and cheeky. So far as arrangements in relation to the camp were concerned, he admitted that there was no telephone on the island and that he had not made any contingency arrangements with any local doctors or hospitals in the event of a medical emergency on the island.

"There is no reference anywhere in these papers to Hamilton being the holder of a firearms licence or, indeed, any reference to firearms at all./

all.

"Brief reference is made in paragraph 6 to allegations that two 'helpers' at the camp, a Stephen Williams and a Kyle Zielenski, had exposed their private parts to some of the boys and rubbed their private parts in the boys' presence. The comment was made that these allegations are uncorroborated.

"The two concluding paragraphs are of particular note. Detective Sergeant McBain pointed out that although many of the complaints were non-criminal in themselves it did seem that the camp conditions were extremely privative with the lack of ease of access and communication being a prime concern. He expressed the view that 'In this respect it could be argued there is serious concern for the boys' moral and physical wellbeing'. He concludes the penultimate paragraph by stating clearly that 'As yet no charges have been preferred'.

"In the last paragraph he requests that the Sub-Divisional Officer, a Chief Inspector Campbell, forwards the report together with the attached statements and accompanying leaflets in connection with the summer camp to the Procurator-Fiscal, Dumbarton and the Reporter to the Children's Panel, Dumbarton for their information and any further action they may deem necessary.

"Involvement of Procurator-Fiscal. The papers recovered from the Procurator-Fiscal's Office, Dumbarton bear a 'backing' sheet with a reference number 0/359/88. The front of the Subject Sheet is date stamped 1st September, 1988, which I take as the date of receipt. The paper are described on the backing sheet as referring to 'Holiday Camp on Island of Inchmoan'.

"The only other marking on the backing sheet is "No Pro JC". Mr. Cardle, then Procurator-Fiscal at Dumbarton, confirmed this to be in his handwriting and to indicate his decision of No Proceedings. Unfortunately this marking is undated.

"Mr. Cardle recollects this matter and the nature of the complaints. Although at the end of the day he decided not to institute criminal proceedings/proceedings against Hamilton he was concerned about the matters revealed in the report. He took the view that the Local Authority, Social Work Department and Reporter had an interest in these matters, and so advised the police.

"However, Mr. Cardle's recollection of events includes two episodes not disclosed from the papers which have been recovered.

"His first recollection of this matter is of a meeting in his office with a CID officer some time before receipt of the Subject Sheet of 30th August. While it may have been DS McBain, Mr. Cardle's recollection is that it was a DS Harry Bell. The officer came to see Mr. Cardle 'out of the blue' not long after Mr. Cardle had returned to the office after a period of illness. This puts the meeting as occurring, by Mr. Cardle's estimate, some time in the week of 18th July, 1988. The officer was looking for guidance and assistance from the Fiscal in connection with complaints about the camp, and had with him a Subject Sheet seeking a Warrant for police to go on to the island and search for and 'take possession' of the children. Needless to say, this was a most unusual application, and Mr. Cardle had a clear recollection of it. Mr. Cardle remembers the Subject Sheet as being in a similar format to and of a similar length to the one dated 30th August. The contents were similar and referred to the unease and concern about the running of the camp on Inchmoan Island. Following complaints from parents the police wanted authority to go on to the island, look for the children then taking part in the camp and remove them.

"Having discussed the matter with the officer, he advised him that on the basis of the information then available he did not consider there to be grounds for seeking a Warrant.

However, he was troubled by the circumstances surrounding the running of the camp and suggested to the officer that the matter was more appropriate for the Social Work Department and Reporter to the Children's Panel. He understood that the police were either already in touch with these agencies or would be drawing the matter to their attention. Mr. Cardle advised the officer to take statements from the boys when they came off the island and thereafter let him have a further report.

"As Mr. Cardle was quite definite in his recollection of this earlier subject sheet I asked the current Procurator-Fiscal at Dumbarton to make a further search in his office to see if any further papers relative to this matter and Hamilton could be found. A further search has been carried out and I am informed that no further papers relating to this matter can be found. Mr. Cardle himself has recently gone into the Dumbarton Office and searched but has been unable to locate the subject sheet. Mr. Cardle was of the view that the subject sheet would have been given a miscellaneous reference number and filed in the office. It may be that as the officer brought it straight in to Mr. Cardle it was not booked in in the normal way and given Mr. Cardle's decision the officer took the subject sheet away with him. That is speculation on my part but this view is shared by Mr. Cardle. I understand that the police have made a search of the Central Registry at Dumbarton Police Office, but no record of an earlier subject sheet can be found.

"Having received on or about first September 1988 the subject sheet from D.S. McBain dated 30th August and having considered it in detail, Mr. Cardle decided to have some of the witnesses, from whom statements had been submitted, precognosed before reaching a decision. No crime report had been submitted against Hamilton and he had not been charged with any crime or offence by the police. Nonetheless Mr. Cardle considered the matter worthy of further Inquiry. His purpose in having the witness precognosed related to obtaining full information about the alleged "assaults" by Hamilton and endeavouring to see if some of the discrepancies between some of their accounts could be reconciled. Virtually all the boys spoke to being/being struck by Hamilton and/or seeing other boys being struck. In a number of statements some of the boys were unable to name the boys they had seen being struck. Some boys described events happening to other boys which these boys did not refer to themselves. Mr. Cardle decided to send out for precognition, the statements of boys who had been at the camp and also the statements of the adults who had visited the camp. He saw no need to precognose the police witnesses.

"Mr. Cardle sent the witness statements out to the Procurators Fiscal in whose jurisdictions they resided with requests that they be precognosed on his behalf. This involved principally the Fiscals at Dunfermline and Stirling. Without seeing the papers Mr. Cardle recollected that he had also sent a statement or statements to the Fiscal at Linlithgow. The only witness in that area appears to me to have been a parent who had visited the camp and who had been highly critical of Hamilton. Her son had attended the camp but either no statement had been taken from him or it had not been included with those submitted to Dumbarton.

"In due course Mr. Cardle received back the precognitions of the witnesses. His recollection is that after precognition the discrepancies between some of the boys' accounts were even greater. Assault were either not corroborated or there were discrepancies between accounts, i.e. boy A would speak to boy B being slapped in his presence but boy B would not recall this, and vice versa. Not all the boys spoke up to their police statements and some of the accounts at precognition were vague.

"Having considered all the papers carefully Mr. Cardle reached the decision that he would not institute criminal proceedings against Hamilton arising out of the events disclosed in the subject sheet of 30th August. He remained concerned at the situation which had been revealed in the papers but was aware it had been drawn to the attention of other agencies who would have a direct interest in these matters and the power to take action themselves, if so advised. He remembers indicating to the police that they should take these matters up particularly with the Social Work Department, the Reporter to the Children's Panel and also/also the Education authorities who were involved in the letting of the school premises for the Clubs. His recollection is being informed by these other agencies were already aware of the matters. He was aware of the Reporter's powers to institute his own proceedings in connection with the care and protection of children.

"His recollection is that while after precognition there may have been one or two incidents for which there was corroborated evidence there were many others where accounts were vague or inconsistent. He did not consider it appropriate to select from the whole picture one or two incidents where there was on paper an apparent sufficiency of evidence. In any event, his recollection is that the one or two incidents for which there was corroborated and consistent evidence were very minor indeed and did not merit criminal prosecution.

"As previously indicated, a further search of the Dumbarton Office has failed to find the precognitions of the witnesses or any correspondence in that connection. During his recent visit to the Dumbarton Office Mr. Cardle found that the papers remaining in the office from that period had been "weeded" in accordance with office practice. Time has not permitted inquiry being made with the Dunfermline, Falkirk and Linlithgow Offices but with the passage of time it is doubtful in my experience whether these offices would still retain any paperwork in connection with precognitions undertaken for another office.

With the papers comprising report 1 was an exchange of correspondence in March 1990 between the Director of Education, Lothian Regional Council, Edinburgh and Mr. Cardle.

"On 13th March 1990 the Director of Education wrote to the Procurator Fiscal, Dumbarton, explaining that in 1989 the Regional Council had suspended Hamilton's let of accommodation at Linlithgow Academy for a boys' Club he was running there in the evenings. The let had been suspended because/because of concern arising from reports that the police were investigating Hamilton's conduct of a camp on Inchmoan island. The Regional Council wished to ascertain whether the investigation had concluded and whether there were to be any proceedings arising from it. They have written to both Central Scotland Police and Strathclyde Police. The reply from an Assistant Chief Constable of Strathclyde Police dated 4th August 1989 started the confusion by referring to a report submitted to the Procurator-Fiscal, Dumbarton, by an Inspector Keenan of Central Scotland Police. The Director of Education understood that report to have been submitted between May and July 1989. In light of that the Regional Council had decided to take no further action pending a decision on proceedings. In the meantime Hamilton had contacted the Ombudsman. The Regional Council wished to know if there were to be proceedings against Hamilton. The decision on the Inchmoan island report had of course been taken by Mr. Cardle in the autumn of 1988. The report referred to by the ACC of Strathclyde Police was in fact the report on Hamilton's complaints against police officers arising out of the enquiries into the Inchmoan island camp.

There/

There is a handwritten note on the Director of Education's letter -- "No report submitted JR 19/3/90". Mr. Cardle tells me that the note is in the handwriting of the then office manager at Dumbarton and that the initials are hers. There is also a pencil note in the margin -- "17th October '89 RPF/PH.89.10748". This is the Regional Procurator-Fiscal's reference in connection with Inspector Keenan's report on Hamilton's complaints against the police.

On 20th March 1990 Mr. Cardle wrote to the Director of Education confirming that he had received a report from Strathclyde Police arising out of the camp and had decided not to take any criminal proceedings against Hamilton in respect of that camp. Mr. Cardle was of course referring to DS McBain's report of 30th August 1988.

There is also with the papers a typed file note dated 20th March 1990 -- the same date as Mr. Cardle's letter to the Director of Education. The note bears Mr. Cardle's initials (typed) and indicates that the report by Central Scotland Police referred to in the letter, although initially brought to the Dumbarton office, had been uplifted by Chief Inspector Brockie of Discipline Branch (Strathclyde Police) and taken to the Regional Procurator-Fiscal at Paisley (Mr. Lees) as the whole tenor of the report related to complaints against the police by Hamilton. The note recorded Mr. Cardle's understanding that Mr. Lees had written to Strathclyde Police on 17th October 1989 advising that he did not consider that the report contained any allegations of a criminal nature involving Strathclyde Police. A report concerning an investigation into a complaint against police officers falls to be considered by a Regional Procurator-Fiscal and not a local District Procurator-Fiscal.

As previously indicated I recovered that report from the Regional Procurator-Fiscal's Office at Paisley and have spoken to Mr. Lees about it. It is a very full and comprehensive report of the investigations into various complaints made by Hamilton against the police officers who were involved in the enquiries into the summer 1988 camp at Inchmoan Island.

There is one matter worthy of comment in relation to Report 1A. On page 19 at the end of his summary Inspector Keenan discusses whether he should meet with Hamilton and interview him about his complaint. It appears that Hamilton had earlier given a very lengthy statement to another officer about his complaint but it had strayed a great deal from the substance of the complaints. Inspector Keenan wrote in his report which was addressed to the Deputy Chief Constable -- "I seek your advice and guidance on this matter as it may be that criminal charges are a possibility against the complainer (Hamilton) and I do not wish to prejudice any enquiry Strathclyde Police may wish to instigate. The page bears a date stamp -- "Deputy Chief Constable Strathclyde Police 16 JUN 1989" and a handwritten note -- "C/Supt Discipline Pse have a senior officer take this report to PF Dumbarton and have any further enquiry necessary carried out". The initials are indecipherable but do not appear to be the initials of the then Deputy Chief Constable Peter Mitchell. While Mr. Lees could not identify the initials he believed them to be those of one of the Assistant Chief Constables who presumably had been standing in for the DCC.

The reading of the note is that the author is particularly directing the report to the Procurator-Fiscal Dumbarton rather than the Regional Fiscal because of Inspector Keenan's reference to the possibility of criminal charges against the complainer, Hamilton. If that be so then the report was not dealt with or treated in that way either by the senior officer or by the District or Regional Fiscal.

It appears that when the report arrived with Mr. Cardle -- and he has no recollection of it being personally delivered to him by a senior officer -- he saw at once that it concerned complaints against police officers, a matter which would not be dealt with by him but by the Regional Fiscal. He looked no further but contacted the Discipline Branch of Strathclyde Police and asked them to uplift the report and deliver it to Mr. Lees in Paisley. He also thinks that he phoned Mr. Lees to advise him of what had happened and to expect the report. Chief Inspector Brockie referred to in Mr. Cardle's note of 20th March 1990 worked previously in the Dumbarton area and was known to Mr. Cardle.

Mr./

Mr. Lees recollects receiving the report and that Mr. Cardle may have phoned him in advance about it. Having considered the report he reached the view that there was nothing of a criminal nature brought out in it so far as the conduct and actings of the police were concerned and marked the papers "No proceedings". He appears to have intimated his decision to the Discipline Branch by phone. Subsequently at their request he wrote to the Discipline Branch on 17th October 1989 confirming his decision. The letter was addressed to Chief Inspector Brockie. If the handwritten note of 16th June 1989 intended that further consideration be given to proceedings against Hamilton in relation to the Inchmoan Island camp then the report was not dealt with in that way either by the Chief Superintendent Discipline to whom the note was addressed, any senior officer tasked to deliver the report, or the Fiscal, Dumbarton, or Regional Fiscal, Paisley.

Mr. Cardle had long since taken his decision not to prosecute. In any event, standing the strict separation of criminal enquiries and enquiries into complaints of criminal conduct by police officers, any information gained in the investigation of Hamilton's complaints by Inspector Keenan could not have been used to further a criminal case against Hamilton. Complaints of criminal conduct against police officers are investigated in Scotland by the Regional Fiscals. As a matter of long standing practice, information elicited in the course of the investigation of a complaint against a police officer or officers remains confidential to the Regional Fiscal's enquiries and is not disclosed to a District Procurator-Fiscal or his staff who may be considering a report against the person making the complaint arising out of the same incident or indeed conducting the prosecution of the complainer. The Procurator-Fiscal Service Regulations, practice and procedures in this area were approved by the High Court of Justiciary in the Opinions in MacLeod v. Tiffney, NORMAND V. RAMAGE, and McINTOSH V. NORMAND.

3. Report 2./

3. REPORT 2.

3.1 Description.

This report is a Central Scotland Police Crime Report against Hamilton, the reporting police officer being a Detective Sergeant Paul Hughes. The report lists ten proposed charges against Hamilton arising out of incidents at a summer camp run by Hamilton at Millarochy Caravan Park, Balmaha, Loch Lomond. The charges are described as 'proposed' as Hamilton had not been cautioned and charged with them by the police. The report includes full statements from some of the boys at the camp. It appears the report was submitted to the Procurator-Fiscal at Stirling around the beginning of September, 1991.

The police enquiries followed a complaint made to the Stirling Police Office on 23rd July, 1991 by a parent on behalf of her 11 year old son who had attended the camp. The parent had been led to believe, like other parents, that the camp would be supervised by some four to six adults. In the event it appears that Hamilton was the only adult supervising this group of boys.

The parent complained inter alia that her son had been slapped/struck by Hamilton in the course of the camp.

As in 1988 Hamilton had insisted that the boys wore small black swimming trunks during the camp. He had taken a large number of photographs of the boys and indeed of one boy in particular. He had also attempted to make a video film of the boys acting out a "boys shipwrecked on deserted island" story. This had been attempted on an inclement day and the boys who were wearing only the small black swimming trunks issued to them by Hamilton complained of being cold and wet. One boy in particular had been made to lie in cold water while Hamilton filmed him.

Apart from the complaints of assault the police were concerned about the number of photographs taken of the boys by Hamilton. Two photographic shops had contacted the police to express concern about the large number of photographs of small boys lodged with them for processing by Hamilton. Many were recovered by the police including a large number of photographs and/and slides from Hamilton himself. While none of these is described as being indecent there was obvious concern about Hamilton's motives in amassing such a large collection.

There were no complaint of indecent conduct or behaviour by Hamilton to the boys.

In relation to the complaints of assault on the boy, whose mother had complained, Hamilton when interviewed by police on 23rd July at the campsite admitted he had slapped the boy on the face and then on the backs of his legs. He maintained he had been disciplining the boy for an accumulation of bad behaviour.

On page 1 of the summary part of the report in the second paragraph of the introduction reference is made in the following terms to previous investigations -- "There have been previous police investigations into concerns of parents which resulted in a report being submitted to the Procurator-Fiscal at Dumbarton".

3.2 Involvement of Procurator Fiscal

As previously indicated the report was submitted with Hamilton being interviewed about all the allegations or cautioned and charged with offences. At the end of August, 1991 having completed most of his enquiries, DS Hughes went into the Fiscal's Office at Stirling to discuss the stage his enquiries had reached and seek advice and guidance on whether he should interview Hamilton. He appears to have been concerned about interviewing Hamilton given the picture he had built up of him and the fact that Hamilton had apparently complained about Hughes' handling of the case. DS Hughes does not remember who he saw but Mr. Valentine has a recollection of meeting him on this matter. In any event, the advice given was that Hughes should approach Hamilton and invite him to attend voluntarily for interview.

The police report records that such an approach was made to Hamilton but he flatly refused to be interviewed.

DS Hughes then submitted his full report to the Procurator-Fiscal's Office. Mr. Valentine remembers/remembers the report coming in and of having a meeting with Hughes about it. It is likely that Hughes took the report in personally. There is no datestamp on the papers but Mr. Valentine accepts DS Hughes' statement that it was brought in on 6th September, 1991.

By that time Mr. Valentine had received a letter from Hamilton about the enquiries into the camp, that letter being dated 26th August, 1991. It is with the papers. Hamilton expresses his concern that any police report submitted "Will be misleading and inaccurate". He appears to have enclosed copy correspondence about the matter which he had sent to parents. The Procurator-Fiscal replied on 29th August acknowledging the letter, advising that a report had not yet been received and that accordingly the photographs could not be returned at that time.

Mr. Valentine discussed the report with DS Hughes and considered the papers fully. He had doubts whether the report revealed sufficient evidence of criminality to merit court proceedings. However, he decided to have further enquiry made and to have the boys precognosed before reaching a final decision. As with Mr. Cardle in 1988, Mr. Valentine was troubled by the contents of the report and the situation that was revealed. He was concerned to know that the situation had been drawn to the attention of other agencies that might have an interest, namely the Social Work Department, the Reporter to the Children's Panel and the local authority Education Department.

The report was passed to his Depute, Mr. Gallagher, to deal with, and towards the end of September Mr. Gallagher wrote to the Procurator-Fiscal at Dunfermline with copies of the statements asking that certain of the boys be precognosed on his behalf. Mr. Gallagher had discussed the matter with Mr. Valentine and it was agreed that only the witnesses speaking to significant matters required to be precognosed.

At this stage mention should be made of a note in the papers from another Depute in the Stirling Office, Mr. Coyne. Mr. Coyne is now retired and I have not interviewed him. Mr. Gallagher's recollection is that before the papers went/went to Dunfermline, Mr. Coyne was asked to consider them and prepare a note. Mr. Coyne reached the view that there was not a great deal to substantiate many of the charges proposed by the police, with the exception, perhaps, of the charges of assault on the boy previously referred to and a breach of the peace charge relating to Hamilton shouting and swearing at the boys.

On 25th September Mr. Gallagher wrote to the Procurator-Fiscal at Dunfermline enclosing a copy of the police summary, the charges proposed by the police and copies of the statements of eight of the boys. He asked that the boys be precognosed stating 'As I indicated, the circumstances are far from clear and I would wish to have precognitions obtained before any other proceedings are instituted. Given the ages of the children, it may be that you will be arranging to have them precognosed in the presence of their parent and it might be useful to obtain any additional information that the parents are able to give in relation to the background to these incidents.' He also enclosed a copy of a letter which Hamilton had sent to his Member of Parliament and which he had copied to the Fiscal. The witnesses to be precognosed were carefully selected.

The precognitions were returned to the Stirling Office on 14th November. The precognition officer, Mr. Burns, who had interviewed the boys, commented that none of the parents had anything to add to their statements and some had shown concern at the thought of Hamilton being suspected of anything untoward. They had not stopped their children going to Hamilton's clubs. He felt that there were no real grounds for a charge against Hamilton in relation to an assault on the boy. Further, he had difficulty in seeing what charge could lie against Hamilton in connection with the taking of photographs of the boys. These comments were of course only by way of assistance to the Stirling Office whose responsibility it was to assess the whole matter in light of all the information available including the precognitions and reach a decision thereon. It was not considered necessary to precognose or have precognosed any other witnesses.

On 18th November, 1991 having considered all/all the material Mr. Gallagher decided to take no criminal proceedings against Hamilton and marked the papers 'No Pro., No Crime Libelled, Not in the Public Interest'. On the same date he wrote to Hamilton advising him of the decision and that the police had been instructed to return to him his photographs.

Mr. Gallagher's marking reflected his view that in relation to some of the allegations he did not consider that the evidence available indicated criminality and that where criminality was indicated the circumstances -- taken at their highest -- were not such as to require prosecution in the public interest.

The backing sheet of the papers also bears a note "Accd has made a comp v Police. Please phone Ch. Inspector Ferguson at Falkirk. B/U to me please 19/3/1992, WG9/3/92'. The first part of the note is in the handwriting of the Office Manager and the second part -- from B/U -- in Mr. Gallagher's writing. His recollection of this is that some time after his decision in the matter his attention was drawn to the fact that Hamilton had made a complaint against the police. He recollects seeing an officer concerned with a disciplinary enquiry -- probably Chief Inspector Ferguson. His marking on the papers would indicate his request on 9th March, 1992 for the papers to be brought to him on 19th March for a meeting.

Both Mr. Valentine and Mr. Gallagher had a good recollection of this report which had been discussed between them on several occasions and also considered by Mr. Coyne.

Both indicated that while the contents of the report had troubled them they were of the view that the conduct revealed had approached but not crossed the border of criminality.

Both were certain that the decision not to institute proceedings against Hamilton had been communicated to the police but could not remember who had done this or how it had been accomplished. Both were prepared to accept DS Hughes' account that the decision had been conveyed by Mr. Coyne.

This/

This Central Scotland subject sheet dated 3rd July, 1992 was sent by Sergeant J. Fleming, Dunblane to the Chief Superintendent, A Division. It concerned a youth camp run by Hamilton at Dunblane High School and in particular the fact that three young boys had been found by police at 10.15 p.m. on 29th June dressed only in pyjamas and sitting on the pavement in Old Doune Road, Dunblane. It transpired that they had run away from Hamilton's camp and had phoned their parents asking them to come and collect them. The police waited with the boys until their parents arrived.

Sergeant Fleming had called at the school the next day and spoken to Hamilton. No further action was taken in connection with this matter. On 2nd July an officer of the Child Unit at Dunfermline had received a complaint from a parent regarding her 10 year old son who had been at the camp. She had complained about the regimentation and lack of supervision at the camp. The officer had been informed of the incident involving the three boys and was arranging to take statements from them. The Child Protection Unit at Bannockburn had been informed and were in contact with their counterparts in Fife.

"The/

"The Subject Sheet bears date stamps of 6th July, 1992 (Callander Police Office) and 9th July, 1992 (Detective Superintendent Headquarters). There is a handwritten note instructing that the Subject Sheet be copied to the Detective Superintendent and to the Deputy Chief Constable for information. DS Hughes has also written a note on page two -- copy to Mr. Valentine P.F. Stirling -- dated 28th July.

"The first copy which I saw bears a stamp at the top of the first page -- Copy To Reporter for information. I have also seen a copy which bears the date stamp of the Regional Reporter Fife Region of 10th August, 1992. It bears a handwritten note apparently in DS Hughes' writing -- Copy to PF.

"Involvement of Procurator-Fiscal. Mr. Valentine recollects the report and deciding it required no action by him. On this occasion the report was dealt with solely by Mr. Valentine and was not seen by Mr. Gallagher. Given the previous report about Hamilton, Mr. Valentine may have mentioned it to him.

"The report was submitted to him for information only. He marked on it 'No Pro. Not a crime'.

"The statements shed light not only on the camp at the High School but also on the clubs run by Hamilton. However, Mr. Valentine took the view that nothing of a criminal nature was indicated.

"Mr. Valentine knew that the matter had also been reported to the Reporter for his information, and recollects advising the police that it appeared to him to be a matter more appropriate to the Reporter's Office and also for the school to consider in connection with the let of its facilities to Hamilton.

"Report 4. Description. The last report is a Central Scotland Police Subject Sheet dated 9th June, 1993 from Detective Constable Taylor CPU (Child Protection Unit) Bannockburn to Detective Superintendent, Crime Management Services.

"It/

"It refers to a number of complaints having been received about Hamilton's Clubs and the operation of them. Complaints also concerned the activities in which the boys were required to participate and in particular the fact that they were made to wear small, ill-fitting trunks which Hamilton provided for them. Concern had also been expressed about Hamilton photographing the boys when they were participating in activities at the clubs.

"The report provided background information about Hamilton and referred to reports previously submitted to the Procurators-Fiscal at Dumbarton and Stirling. A copy of DS Hughes' report to the Stirling office (Report 2) was included.

"This is the only one of the four reports or Subject Sheets which makes reference to Hamilton being the holder of a firearms certificate.

"The Subject Sheet concluded with a request that it be submitted to the Procurator-Fiscal at Stirling for consideration to be given to obtaining a Warrant to search Hamilton's house for photographs, photographing equipment, documentation and other items which might be relevant to police enquiries.

"Concern had been expressed particularly about a situation where a parent found Hamilton alone in the gymnasium at Stirling High School with a nine-year-old boy. The boy was dressed only in swimming trunks and was being photographed performing press-ups. The boy was supposed to be attending five-a-side football, but it transpired that that had never taken place, and the gymnasium had not been booked by Hamilton for that activity.

"A further complaint concerned a nine-year-old boy being photographed at a club at Dunblane High School performing exercises with another boy.

"Involvement of Procurator-Fiscal. This Subject Sheet was considered by Mr. Gallagher. Mr. Valentine had no recollection of having seen it before and said he was not aware of it. On seeing the date of it, Mr. Valentine realised that he had been absent from the office at that time due to a personal tragedy.

"Mr. Gallagher considered the contents of the Subject Sheet and the request for a Search Warrant.

"Detective Constable Taylor had brought the Subject Sheet to the Fiscal's office personally and had the opportunity of discussing it with Mr. Gallagher. Having considered the information provided and having discussed it with the officer Mr. Gallagher reached the view that there was insufficient material to justify an application for a Warrant to search Hamilton's house. He remained of the view that while the conduct was of concern it did not yet cross the border into criminality. However, he expressed the view that the police should continue their enquiries and report further to him if any more evidence came to light.

"Mr. Gallagher marked the Subject Sheet 'Warrant refused meantime. B/U three months'. This marking is dated 11/6/93, which according to Mr. Gallagher was the date of the submission of the Subject Sheet to him. He intended to review the matter in three months to ascertain if matters had progressed. If the police discovered additional evidence or evidence of indecent or grossly improper conduct towards the boys then the matter would be reconsidered.

"Mr. Gallagher advised the reporting officer that he did not consider that the circumstances surrounding the taking of photographs revealed the commission of a crime by Hamilton. However, the matter would be reviewed if additional evidence was reported indicating a change in the character of the circumstances such as to merit their description as criminal. Meantime, the police were advised that they need not report further instances of the same conduct unless there was a change in the character of the circumstances, indicating criminality. Mr. Gallagher does not now recall the details of the discussions with the reporting officer. His recollection is that he was concentrating on whether some form of indecency was going on. I made Mr. Gallagher aware of the account of the meeting given by DS Gordon Taylor in his statement. While Mr. Gallagher could not say for certain that there had been no discussion about whether the crime of breach of the peace might be applicable, he indicated that he would frankly be surprised/surprised if he had said that a breach of the peace could not be constituted where alarm had been caused to a third party.

"It is of note that as at this time no indecent photographs of boys had been recovered or seen in connection with this or previous enquiries. There was no doubt that Hamilton took an unusually large number of photographs of boys, but while the circumstances in which they were taken and the manner of the boys' dress were troubling, the photographs could not be described as indecent.

"According to the papers, Mr. Gallagher reviewed them again on 10th September, 1993, when he added the marking 'No Pro'. His recollection is that no further information had come to light by that time. He cannot remember whether he contacted the police at this time, but considers it probable that he would have".

LORD CULLEN: Thank you, Mr. Lake. That concludes matters for this afternoon. We will resume at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m.

WEDNESDAY, 26th JUNE, 1996.

TWENTY-FIRST DAY.

LORD CULLEN: Mr. Bonomy, I think we are without Mr. Jones today, so you can proceed.

MR. BONOMY: Thank you, sir. I have had brought to my attention a witness who claims to have been abused by Hamilton. This is the first such evidence that has come to light. He is unwilling to be identified. I have given anxious consideration to the question whether an anonymous written statement of his evidence should be read to the Inquiry. The view I have formed, with some hesitation, is that that is the appropriate course in the circumstances, albeit it is not an ideal course. I also consider it appropriate to advise the Inquiry that there are certain matters mentioned in the statement peripheral to the meat of the statement that one might expect would be corroborated by independent evidence. Efforts have been made to try to corroborate that without any success.

You should also be advised, sir, that the witness has in the past been convicted of a serious crime of dishonesty.

That is a full account of the background, and with your leave, sir, I propose to invite Mr. Lake to read the statement.

LORD CULLEN: Yes -- Mr. Lake?

MR. LAKE: This is the anonymous statement -- "When I was about 12 and living at home I attended a Boys' Club called the Rovers Group at Bannockburn High School, which was run by Thomas Hamilton. I think I got to know about it through certain leaflets that came through the letter box. I attended that for about four weeks. I remember that on two occasions we got to shoot guns at the Club in Dunblane. This Club wasn't at the school but in a hut on the other side of the dual carriageway. We shot with real rifles with bullets, not pellets. Hamilton picked us up and took us to Dunblane. We once went to the High School/

School in Dunblane and joined in with that Club. It was a gymnastics Club.

"When the summer came, a trip was organised to go and stay on a boat. I got permission to go to it and Hamilton sent a letter home setting out the details of the camp trip, boat, how much money we needed etc.

"The holiday was to last for about a week or a week and a half and we were staying on a cabin cruiser on Loch Lomond. There were about eight boys of my age involved. The only boy I remember being there was my sister's boyfriend. I don't know who the other boys were but we were all specially chosen from the Bannockburn Club.

"One day I remember that I was particularly frightened because Hamilton was tying a rope round us, one at a time, and throwing us off the side of the boat and then pulling us back in. I cannot now remember what the purpose of this manoeuvre was, but I remember being very frightened and I refused to take part and pretended that I was ill and stayed in the cabin.

"That night I was told to report to his cabin. The boys all slept together at the back of the boat and Hamilton slept in his own cabin. I eventually went in. I only had on my underpants. He had a sort of telescopic pointer device which you would use to point to a map or a chart and he was pointing this at me and he told me that I had better behave. He began to touch me between my legs and my private parts and I was very scared. I started to cry.

"He told me to stop crying or I would be hit with the pointer. While all this was going on he was only dressed in shorts. I was then told to lie down on his bed and I was lying facedown. He started to push his fingers into my backside. By this time he had his shorts off and his penis was erect. He was rubbing it. He was also stroking my back and asked if I liked it. At one point I was crying and he banged this pointed device down at the side of my face. It didn't actually touch me, but hit the pillow. I lay there frozen stiff with fear. He then told me to stand up and face the wall and again he ran his hand up and down my back and/

and he was breathing heavily.

"I was then allowed to go. I was terrified, and then the next day I phoned my mother and asked if I could come home. All I did was to tell her I was homesick. I couldn't tell her what took place. I came home at the same time as everyone else. It was too far away for me to come home early. He didn't touch me again during the period of this holiday although I was very frightened of him.

"I can't be more specific about the year this happened. I do remember though that the boat blew up about a week after the trip.

"I do agree, however, that what he did to me should be known about. It has affected me badly and has always troubled me."

ROY CAMERON (49), Sworn:

EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMY: Are you Roy Cameron? - I am, sir.

And are you presently the Chief Constable of Dumfries and Galloway Police? - That is correct, sir.

I think you are also Chief Constable designate of another Force? - That is correct -- Lothian & Borders Police, sir.

When do you take up that post? - The 6th September this year.

What age are you? - I am 49 years of age.

How long have you been a police officer? - 30 years' service.

Can you take us through your service, please? - Yes; I started as a cadet in Dumbartonshire; followed that with beat duties in Dumbartonshire Constabulary; was promoted sergeant fairly/fairly early in service and covered a range of patrol and administration duties. I had a secondment to the University about that point, returning to a range of operational duties in Strathclyde Police in 1975. In that capacity, I served various roles as a sub-divisional commander, a divisional commander, through all the ranks to Chief Superintendent. In 1990 I was appointed Assistant Chief Constable. At that time I was responsible for personnel and training, and also an operational role on a regular basis as the Assistant Chief Constable. I changed course within Strathclyde in 1992, and in that capacity was responsible for management services which embraced research and development administration, and continued operational duties. Within that range of experience, I have had on occasions direct line management of firearms administration and enforcement as a Chief Superintendent and Assistant Chief Superintendent. Since the 1st May, I have been Chief Constable of Dumfries & Galloway Constabulary, and in that capacity have a general over-sight for firearms regulation and control within the Force, including direct involvement in decisions on revocations and refusal.

The 1st May which year? - The 1st May 1994.

You are also the Chairman of a body known as ACPO S; can you tell us what that body is? - Yes, I can. I am Chairman, but the titular designation is National President of the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland, and that is a professional and consultative body that represents the eight Scottish Police Forces, and has a role in relation to policy formation and deliberation across a wide range of operational and other issues affecting the police in Scotland, and we have close links with the other Staff Associations, the Scottish Police Federation, representing the federated ranks, and Superintendents Association, and close involvement with like national bodies in England and Wales.

What ranks in the police are members of your body? - The ranks as such are Chief Constables and Assistant Chief Constables, and those Assistant Chief Constables who are designated as deputies. Prior to the 1st of April 1995, they had the/the rank and title of Deputy, but the rank itself was abolished as a result of police reforms that year, although the job title still remains and the post still remains.

And which ranks are members of the Scottish Police Federation? - The Scottish Police Federation covers those ranks from Constable to Chief Inspector.

And I take it in the middle of the sandwich we have the members of the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents?
- That is correct.

A submission has been made to the Inquiry jointly by these three bodies; is that right? - Indeed.

And it is a very full submission. It is accompanied by a very helpful summary and some annexes. I am not going to ask you to tell us what is in your submission which is available for all to see. I just want to get the frame-work of this submission clear first of all. Did all three bodies agree on everything in the submission? - Yes; this is the shared view, the consensual view of the three Staff Associations of Scotland, representing all the ranks of the Scottish Police Service within the hierarchy earlier described.

The Federation, Superintendents Association and ACPO S jointly agreed the submission. There is total support for the recommendations therein. Readers of the evidence will have noted slight nuances where different opinions were expressed about how certain recommendations might be achieved, primarily in relation to the area of appeals but in terms of the care recommendations and the consensual view, that is the unanimous view of the three Staff Associations.

What I do want to ask you about is some practical issues that arise not just from your submission, but from other submissions in relation to the administration of the firearms licensing system, and I think the best place to start that exercise is by looking at another document we have had some evidence about called the Report on a Thematic Inspection of Police Forces. Do you have a copy of that? - If I could just clarify we are speaking/speaking to the same document -- this is Her Majesty's Inspector of Constabulary Draft Thematic Inspection and Administration of the Firearms Licensing System 1995 draft dated April 1996?

What the Inquiry has seen is a draft dated 8th February 1996, and what you are confirming is something that we have had a hint of already, that there have been certain amendments made to that? - If I could comment, there was, as I recall, an earlier draft, and it would be my understanding that comments would be made on that earlier draft, and that may be reflected in the second draft. It has had no formal route through the ACPO S consultative process I described earlier, but certainly there was a previous draft, and this is an amended version.

Can/

Can you confirm that there are no significant amendments to it? - The only amendment I would call to attention as significant would be really in relation to the counter-signatures or counter-signatories, rather. My recollection, sir, is that there was a view that in the original draft, those who have read it might remember that the counter-signatories it was suggested should be discontinued. In the present, April draft it mentions it should be reviewed. Such view I would add is consistent with the views expressed elsewhere about the perceived current value of counter-signatories in terms of current practice. The only significance is in relation to the change in words. I cannot comment on what the intention might be behind the change.

MR. BONOMOY: Sir, I have had some enquiry made into the status of the draft before the Inquiry in view of what Mr. Taylor said at the time about thinking it was at the printers. You, sir, now have a copy of a police memo dated 19th June, 1996.

LORD CULLEN: Yes, I have that.

MR. BONOMOY: That is as a result of that enquiry. Detective Chief Inspector Robertson gave evidence to the Inquiry about the investigation he was in overall charge of in relation to firearms and licensing of firearms to Hamilton. He was asked to take a position on this, and he has reported that there are certain amendments in an updated draft. These are all spelled out. The one Mr. Cameron is referring to is particularly mentioned on page two of this report. At the top of the page you will see in italics the two separate recommendations highlighted.

Now, sir, I also have the fresh draft of April, 1996, which you may not yet have, and I can give that to the Bar Officer. I am advised that your report covers all the amendments.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY:
Now, there are three matters arising out of the thematic/thematic inspection report I want to ask you about, and I want to ask you about the practical issues or difficulties concerning matters: do you understand? - Yes.

One is the encouragement towards civilianisation of the Firearms Administration Department, the second is the encouragement towards postal renewal of firearms certificates and the third one is the idea in the original draft now modified of initially abandoning and now reviewing the position of counter-signatories: do you understand? - Yes.

Taken together, these suggest a sort of slackening of the overall approach to licensing of firearms throughout the country. Now, is that a fair summary of the attitude that was prevailing prior to the incident at Dunblane? - If I could comment, sir, I think it would be fair to set both these drafts in a broader context. The thematic inspection as I interpret it is in fact a good practice review of Firearms Administration against previous good practice recommendations dating from a Home Office circular of 1991, which is in fact listed in our appendix of evidence. We identify that document there. I am not aware, sir, that in fact the Tribunal is privy to this first submission, but if it is helpful, it is the report of the Working Group on the administration of firearms licensing system, issued by the Home Office in November, 1991. I think that sets a climate of good administration practice which Forces have been encouraged to pursue since that time. Now, in my own experience I have had criticism from certificate holders and those with interests in firearms for failing to implement certain of these good practice recommendations vis-a-vis the proposal and renewal: but I think you have to set it in that climate, and if there is a perception of a removal away from more rigorous regulation then that pre-judges the report from HM Chief Inspector of Constabulary.

What you are suggesting I think is that if that is perceived as a sort of slackening of the system then what we should bear in mind is that the police are simply following the guidance they got from the Home Office? - I think that is the encouragement. It would be fair to say in this instance in relation to one of the things you wish to/

to focus upon, postal renewal, that within the Scottish Forces there has been some reluctance to pursue that innovation, especially in regard to the renewal of firearms certificates.

The Inquiry has heard so far references to the Home Office, a policy in relation to the administration of the firearms licensing system, and that was updated in 1989? - Yes.

Can I take it that is guidance that applies throughout the UK, and that there is no separate Scottish guidance? - There is no separate Scottish guidance, no.

So in that document and the one you have referred to we are looking at guidance which is expected to be followed throughout the UK? - Yes, that is correct.

BY LORD CULLEN: I think the 1991 document you have just referred to is the one referred to in 1.3 of the thematic report, in paragraph (ii)? - Yes, sir.

LORD CULLEN: I think probably by now I have accumulated all of the documents referred to in the annexe. Perhaps I can say at this point that it is my intention to make known to parties a total list of documents that have become available to me. When it is published you can know exactly what my library is.

MR. BONOMOY: Thank you, sir.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY:
Let's take the one you have identified yourself as not meeting with full support in Scotland, and that was the idea of postal renewal. Can you tell me first of all what you perceive as the disadvantages of postal renewal? - Again, it is not the case that there is a recommendation that there should be a blanket approach to postal renewal. The question is, where there is no change in individual circumstances in terms of the reason or the firearms held then there was a feeling it was unnecessary to have a home visit unless something was revealed in the application form or in our knowledge at that time: so it is not an absolute blanket. Having said that, whilst several Forces have progressed, as the/

the law stands in relation to shotguns most of us have been reluctant to pursue it in regard to firearms, because we think it is essential to continue to have as many home visits as are possible in order to complement the quality of the enquiry we were making. Of course, it will perhaps be known to the Tribunal that there is no distinct power of entry for a home visit or to examine shop premises. I think there is an assumption this power exists, whereas it does not. We feel in short, sir, that it has a potential to reduce the quality of the enquiry you would make in the interests of public safety, and in the interests of applying the regulatory aspects as opposed to the administrative aspects of firearms law.

We are likely to hear in due course that attempting as a psychiatrist or as a psychologist to forecast violence or forecast mental disorder is if not impossible almost impossible. These things can happen, changes in personality and in mental condition can happen, at very short notice. Do you think it is a good idea to take such opportunities as are available to make contact with holders of firearms certificates? - That I think would be not only my view but a widely-shared view within the Association of Chief Police Officers.

Now, if you reduce the opportunities for this to occur by extending the life of firearms certificates from three years to five years, as has occurred, does that not make it even more important that when the renewal does come up contact should remain with the individual applicant? - Yes. I think that is fair comment. It is difficult to reconcile the notion of regulation with a time span of renewal of five years allied to postal renewals. Even if there is the odd sampling type visit, that is quality control. Conceivably, then, in the extreme case someone could go through a lifetime of firearms possession without any form of physical check of the home. So our view, from looking at the current state of the law on administration, we would argue we should be resuming a yearly cycle of renewals.

Do you see any advantage in extending the life of a certificate from three to five years? - I see a disadvantage, if we regard the primacy of public safety, and that is, to refer back to the initial/initial point, it is reducing an opportunity for contact, it is reducing an opportunity for inspection and enforcement.

Do you have a view on whether it would be a good idea to reduce the life again from five years to some shorter period? - I believe in terms of our recommendations we should be reverting to three years, and I think in any review of firearms there may be scope for some consideration in particular instances as to whether it needs to be less. Certainly our basic recommendation would be to revert to three years.

Do you still adhere to the view that postal renewals might be okay for shotguns, which we have heard some evidence can be just as lethal as firearms, depending on the circumstances? - I think it is anomalous. I think within the terms of the law as it stands there are differences in standards with regard to good reason, even in regard to the basic qualifications.

We would bring shotguns on to the same standard as firearms. We would see there being one certificate and unification of the law in regard to both categories of weapon, so that there would be a firearms certificate, and the administration regulations would be standardised throughout. Ergo we would be saying postal renewals and five year renewals would be inappropriate at the moment.

Let us assume this could be a bit beyond the issues arising at this Inquiry, and there were still two separate types of certificate. Would you be of the view that postal renewals should not apply to either? - That would be our view as an Association, and indeed the unanimous view of the three Associations.

The second item of the three in the thematic inspection report I would like to deal with was the question of counter-signatures, where the recommendation was obviously towards abandoning counter-signatures. Do you think the alteration in the stance of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector is anything to do with the incident at Dunblane? - I don't think I can comment, sir, as to what was in the mind of the Inspectorate.

So/

So it is not as if it was discussed in any discussion that you were privy to? - As I stated at the outset, sir, the document is a draft, it has had no formal consultative line at all within the Association at this stage.

Now, counter-signatories are supposed to be people that one might place some reliance on; is that fair? - I think, sir, that that was the intent, but I think we would argue that by extending the definition to include -- I think I would quote correctly "Persons of similar standing" then that leaves the issue open perhaps to a wide interpretation and perhaps a degradation of the....

I take it there is some advantage in having counter-signatories to a form? - There could be, but as practice had emerged, for many years it has been recognised that the counter-signatory system needed to be reviewed.

Now, do you consider that there should be counter-signatories? Let's leave the quality aside for the moment? - Yes, I think as a principle the fact that an individual is applying for possession of a weapon, there ought to be a reference system for that individual, including some form of counter-signatory.

Does that help the police in checking up on the character of the individual who is applying? - If a counter-signatory has a proper and full role in the process of vouching for them that can be a much closer reference than has been the case hitherto, and a clearer reference.

Does that mean we have to have some sort of formula defining the qualification of counter-signatories? - Yes. We have suggested it has to be someone well-known to the individual and someone who has known them for a minimum of five years; and we think in that way if there were appropriate guidelines in relation to their role and duty in relation to the process it would be a helpful measure.

What about the standing of the individual? - I think it has to be someone who is of good character in the community, so I think we need to look at the criteria, and how that is defined./

defined. I think as I have described earlier, it certainly has fallen into some disrepute.

BY LORD CULLEN: What do you see as the general objective of counter-signatories? - The objective would be to perhaps allow another line for behaviour in an individual in relation to their wider character. It would be another check, another balance within the system at the point of grant and renewal that would be of assistance to us as part of that enquiry. The individual is coming to the service as potentially an anonymous applicant. There can be records checked. It might be that in having a properly constructed reference process involving medical information, involving character references, in the same way as you would validate someone for an occupation or for some other form of serious licensing that would be a better reference.

Leaving medical matters to one side, what you are talking about is some form of collateral check on a person who is of himself of good standing but can be rather more positive in his approval or support than is presently required? - Absolutely, sir.

Would you favour that such a person should have himself or herself no firearm certificate? - I have no view on that. I think that is a point to look at, but I think the overall character of the individual, the fact they have a good knowledge of the applicant and can actually fulfil the role of reference, hopefully, is an important criterion.

That is looking at someone who is so to speak outside the shooting scene. That is not why he has been chosen. It has also been suggested to me, however, that perhaps there should be two counter-signatories, one of whom might be able to stick strictly to, if you like, the characteristics or character of the applicant, or who know the applicant from a shooting point of view. Have you any ideas about that? - I am sure that would be helpful. It may be helpful in the sense of giving a little weight to the information available to someone who is a member of a club, for example. I can see the possibilities of that. It would give a professional, informed view of that individual's general safety, perhaps.

EXAMINATION/

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY:

Can you help a little more on how you define the qualifications of that person? "Good character" is in itself a very vague expression. It doesn't pin down the qualification very well? - At this point frankly I am not sure I could be of much more help than that. I think this is a point we have raised, and I think it is one that calls for careful reflection, in the light of cumulative experience. We have made specific recommendations in principle, someone who is known to the applicant for at least five years and can vouch for them, someone of good standing within the community. I know that raises all sorts of problems with definition. I wouldn't pretend at this point to elaborate greatly on that, other than to make the point I think it is a valid suggestion.

In practice do the police officers check on the counter-signatories? - According to the good practice guidelines at present there is no encouragement to check up on counter-signatories other than in exceptional circumstances. Most Forces will have some kind of check on the counter-signatories, but the advice given in the good practice note does not in fact indicate that it is necessary in every case.

You would have a problem if you had a plausible applicant supported by a plausible counter-signatory, neither of whom shows up on any of your record checks, who are both very articulate and persuasive people, would you not? - That is a problem. That is a fact of any licensing system we could design.

I am thinking of this present case at the moment when I pose that question? - Yes, there is a practical difficulty, if there is no tangible, transparent, verifiable evidence then there is a grave difficulty in taking any form of regulatory control.

I suppose that is why we have at the present time categories in Scotland such as a JP or a minister, on the basis that perhaps because you could not keep checking up on counter-signatures you need some sort of touchstone for the counter-signatory to start with? - Yes, I wouldn't dispute that. I think the question is how genuine a role such/such people although of good standing can actually fulfil in relation to the applicant.

Now, the third of these issues you mentioned in regard to the report is the matter of civilianisation. Has that so far as it has occurred to date been a good thing? - I think there are benefits in civilianisation. If I could focus on the thematic experience, that urged Forces to progress civilianisation of firearms registering and as much enquiry work as possible, but there are caveats in relation to who would be responsible for supervision, etc.

I think civilianisation has brought expertise and consistency to this process. I would strongly argue that in my own experience in my own Force that the acquisition of experienced firearms field officers has brought a level of experience and expertise to the process that we did not have before. That has to be balanced against a context where there is some adequate police line management, in my view, with powers of supervision and decision-making in some of the more complex issues that might arise with regard to the suitability of an individual.

I will come to that line management issue in a moment. One difficulty or one perhaps weakness that was identified by one witness earlier was that civilian firearms officers might not have the enquiring technique of a police officer and perhaps not get essential information from the applicant. Now, do you see a disadvantage there in engaging civilian firearms officers? - I think, sir, if I can first make a comment. I think there is a counter argument that it is easier to be duped by an individual applicant if you have no knowledge of firearms. I think that is an issue. If you send someone untrained and unaware, who may have investigative abilities but who has no technical knowledge of firearms, then that person I think is at a disadvantage in dealing with the information he receives and being able to evaluate it. I therefore believe that provided someone is given sufficient training, the process I do not think is a complicated one. I think there are issues that need to be resolved within it but so far as firearms are concerned, the categories of person who should not be getting one are fairly clear cut. The difficulty arises always where that person is outwith that particular loop and you have no collateral and I would say it would be problematic for a police officer to have any greater skill in eliciting that if it cannot be substantiated.

So you see advantages in having civilians that outweigh any possible disadvantages? - I think, sir, there are advantages in engaging civilians giving a balanced approach to the administration and enforcement issues.

Now, looking at the question then of the line management. Assuming for the moment that the investigation carried out by the Department and the day-to-day administration of the Department is in the hands of civilians, what supervision do you see as necessary for these civilians? - My personal belief, sir, is that given that it is the Chief Officer of the police who has responsibility for the Act, there will still be very clear line management at senior level over the firearms function and that can vary from Force to Force depending on the scale of operations. In my situation, I have a Superintendent who has over action control of the firearms function with a sergeant and direct line management/management of the group who deal with the matter and if there are problems then there is joint discussion on the issues up to Chief Officer level. That is how I do it and I am not saying that is an ideal but it is a method we use.

Do you have a civilian firearms examiner? - Yes, we have two, sir.

So your own structure envisages investigation by civilians but supervision by police officers? - Yes, and if that civilian has a difficulty.....they are mature people and if they have suspicions aroused or if there is something they are uncomfortable with then they would liaise with their police officer counterparts and further enquiries would be made.

What about the suggestion that unless there is a difficulty identified the civilian firearms officer should have the power to make the decision? In other words, grant the renewal? - I think in effect, sir, that is what is happening. They are the individuals who have conducted the enquiry. They have the knowledge and de facto they are in full possession of the facts to make that decision and I don't see a difficulty with that in relation to renewal of Firearms Certificates because I think it acknowledges the reality of what is happening but I think there has to be a good linkage within that for the grant of certificates. I think that is a very important step in the process where, in my view, there should still be a police involvement. I think there is scope for looking at whereinafter there needs to be an actual physical signature on a certificate by a chief police officer.

BY LORD CULLEN: You said the civilians have the knowledge and they have the facts. What does that pre-suppose about the weight of the information which is actually given to them at the time when or shortly after they make their enquiries? - Well, if the enquiry is being conducted on the basis of what has been seen as good practice, if they are trained and if the individual has completed the form accurately and if the counter-signatory side of it can be better addressed, then with the antecedent history they should have acquired, and there is a set process for that/that through record checks and through criminal intelligence checks, the individual who is an obvious problem will surface. The difficulty is always there, sir, where there is no transparent difficulty. There is no identifiable issue in terms of previous conduct, in terms of previous convictions or whatever. Whether there is a police officer or a civilian involved in that situation, if nothing is surfacing then it is very, very difficult to say.

I understand that but your answer presumably presupposes that all information available to the police in whatever form is available to the officer conducting the enquiry, is that right? - Well, the process should allow for that in relation to firearms files that have been built up. If it is a renewal or on the basis of the type of enquiry that is conducted locally, relevant information ought to be capable of being absorbed within the loop of that enquiry.

But if in effect you see enquiry officers being civilians and taking decisions effectively, that must mean that they are placed in possession of all the information which is accessible to the police? - Yes, sir.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY: Do you see any disadvantage for the police if the actual investigation of firearms enquiries be carried out by civilians and then perhaps police officers perhaps lose contact with the subject? - A disadvantage with the police losing contact with the subject?

Yes? - There is a possibility but not very many police officers in the modern age have the level of training or expertise to actually conduct a technical enquiry in relation to firearms. In relation to for example establishing what is good reason. There is a real difficulty with that. If someone says they require a particular firearm for a particular reason, given the range of hybrid weapons and different types of weapons used and the type of sports that have emerged, I think there is a case for somebody with technical knowledge to deal with that and not very many police officers have that and if you train police officers, with the turnover involved in a police career, that expertise is likely/likely to be lost in the modern age.

Do you see perhaps an advantage, though, in, at the end of the investigating process, a senior officer, a very senior officer, having to make a decision based on all the information that is available to the police about the applicant? In other words, sitting down with the complete historical police file and the result of the current investigation and applying his experience and judgment to all of that rather than leaving it to a civilian who is simply engaged to carry out the technical function of examining and enquiring into a firearms applicant? - Well, within the balance of management I would argue, sir, that that should be happening. In some Forces the Deputy Chief Constable will sign certificates. In others, senior officers are used and it is alluded to here, a facsimile stamp authorised by the Chief Constable who will initial it. But he is reviewing the file. There is an issue there about whether that is appropriate or whether he should sign the certificate at the time of grant and then my own belief is that it should be a very careful decision with police involvement. I think when there has been no change in relation to the renewal stage, that raises different considerations as to whether that requires a police officer's involvement at that point. But I see no difficulty with the point you make, sir. All I am trying to register here is a question of balance.

Yes, you perhaps didn't mean to put it this way but one of the things you did say at the beginning of that answer was your experience shows that senior officers are signing certificates. Now, we have had evidence in the Inquiry of certificates being signed where that is the only thing the senior officer has in front of him. Now, what I am proposing to you is a situation where the whole history plus the result of the current Inquiry is before that officer who then applies both his experience and his judgment before allowing even the renewal, which is effectively a re-grant? - Yes.

Now, do you not think first of all that from a commonsense point of view that should happen and secondly that it is necessary for public confidence? - I think that is a point that requires to be reviewed. I think the issue of a certificate/certificate is an important decision and I am not saying that the police should be excluded from that. All I would say to you, sir, is that from Force to Force practices may differ according to structure.

Well, we know that in recent times consideration has been given to setting up a Firearms Control Board and that the idea has been fully explored and has not been implemented. Are the police comfortable with the function of dealing with firearms licences? - Yes, I believe we are comfortable with the function. I believe it is a responsibility for the police and the Secretary of State as appropriate to continue to be responsible for the Firearms Act. I think there are issues underlying that where improvements could be made but that would stray into the evidence we have presented but I think it is quite clearly something that we should manage. I think even if you had a Board, sir, there would still be a requirement for local police involvement in the process and I think that was well rehearsed in the Home Office Study in that respect a few years ago.

One of the things that is said in the thematic inspection report at paragraph 1.8 is "Many members of the shooting public object to the fact that their pursuit of lawful sport or hobby is governed by Acts of Parliament which along with involvement of the police in administrative procedures are seen as placing too much emphasis on the criminal aspects of firearms use at their expense". Now, is it the police experience that there is any resentment towards them from the shooting public because of their involvement in the administrative process? - I think there is activity and lobbying by shooters who have a particular perspective on the use of firearms and that can manifest itself individually or as representative groups. I have had personal experience when I have made decisions of having complaints from individuals or from shooting lobbies about actions that have been taken within the Chief Constable's discretion. I think there is an active group of people there who would perceive they have a legitimate interest in sport and other life activities and that is articulated in active group.....

Yes, but overall do you think that there is/

is a good relationship between the police and the shooting public? -
I think there is a good relationship. I think we strive to maintain a reasonable liaison with shooting interests.

Well, is that respected by the shooting interest in your experience? - I think in general, yes. In specific cases there will always be opposition to what we do.

Now, can I take you into a different area which is also dealt with in the report and I really want to try to get some specific factual information from you and that is the area of the use of technology? - Yes.

And we have heard reference on a number of occasions at the Inquiry to a Scottish Criminal Records check or an SCRO check? - Yes.

Now, what is the SCRO? - The SCRO is the Scottish Criminal Record Office. It is a service which covers the eight Forces in Scotland and provides a criminal history file, fingerprints and it is a database which serves the local requirements of the Scottish Police Service. It links into that development in England and Wales but in simple terms it is a criminal record database.

Is it centralised? - It is centralised, yes.

If I am an officer in England and I am doing criminal record checks, will that check take in the Scottish system? - You could do a check with the Scottish Criminal Records Office specifically but there is no database link as such. The PNC would cover certain records of an individual but the SCRO is the Scottish link. It is linked with Phoenix which is a system which is emerging from England and Wales and I think as technology evolves it will be a joint link.

At the moment if you are an English officer and you want to know about Scottish records you ask Scottish Records specifically and does the same apply in reverse, that if you are a Scottish officer and wanting English records you would have to go to the English Records Office? - You could ring up through the SCRO to have that.

Is/

Is that a check with English Records or is it the Police National Computer we are talking about? - It is being built up on a database with Phoenix. That is the English equivalent of our SCRO.

Is that something separate from what we keep hearing about as the PNC or the Police National Computer? - The Police National Computer deals with named individuals who are wanted, missing, suspected, disqualified drivers and stolen vehicles.

So it is dedicated to certain areas of police investigation work? - Yes, it is a national U.K. wide database.

That is separate, though, from the records that are kept in either England or Scotland? - Yes.

And we have also heard of the DVLA which is the Driving and Vehicle Licensing Authority? - Yes.

And they seem to have a part to play in checks that are made in relation to firearms applications? - Records for road traffic convictions are held by the DVLA. Disqualified drivers also go on to the Police National Computer. The DVLA is accessed by a form. There is no database link directly at the moment but that is being worked on.

From what you have said, can I take it that SCRO does not necessarily record road traffic convictions, even those including disqualification?

- There was a policy decision made many years ago that the DVLA would be a repository for road traffic convictions. There has been a recent review in relation to the recording of traffic driving convictions and the like with a view to putting them on a database in SCRO and work is progressing on that but there is access to road traffic convictions through the DVLA. It was seen as a duplication of data.

How/

11.00 a.m.

How long does a DVLA check take? - A DVLA check routinely, because it's done not by data, but a form, can take up to three weeks, and if there is a very urgent check, it can be done by telephone, and it should also be borne in mind that disqualified drivers would show up on the PNC database.

Do you agree nevertheless that to get the complete picture of someone's criminal record in its widest sense, you really need to check up with all three of these sources? - Yes. I think any prudent individual, anybody doing a thorough enquiry would check with SCRO, PNC and DVLA, and also with such criminal intelligence as would be available.

Can I take it that all the Scottish Police Forces would have ready access somewhere in their establishment to those three sources -- in fact four sources -- including criminal intelligence? - Yes, there should be.

Does each police force have identical computer equipment on which they record their own criminal intelligence? - No. The position with criminal intelligence, I think you have to take a step back from these particular applications, that the evolution of information technology in the police service has not been one of standardisation. There is an evolving information system strategy which will in future pull together on a common database in a more standardised way the applications in the police service in Scotland, but at the moment the three are localised. SCRO, however, does fulfill a reference point for flagging intelligence. Where intelligence is held on somebody who is on the SCRO database, then there is a facility to flag that so it can be identified to an enquiring force that there is another body interested in an individual and may hold intelligence on them.

But is there something to be said for aiming at a situation where criminal intelligence held by one Force is readily available whenever another Force does a check on a named individual with his date of birth? - Yes, that is within the on-going/on-going strategy.

When will that be in existence? - That is difficult to predict at the moment, but it is being worked on over the next three years, and it is at a very advanced stage in terms of the outlined strategy to be developed.

And is that development confined to Scotland or is it a UK wide development? - There is a ITIS strategy for England and Wales. There has been joint working to see where there can be commonality, and at National Criminal Intelligence Service level, there is a growing UK database and exchange in relation to high level crime, but a lot of low level crime activity, local intelligence, remains to be linked, and that will, we believe, emerge with the developing ITIS strategies in England and Wales.

So eventually you will be able to make these checks UK wide from your own Force computer? - Hopefully it will go beyond that eventually and allow linked access as well in the much longer term.

If I check up with SCRO on a named individual with his date of birth, will that tell me whether he holds a Firearms Certificate? - Yes, there is a database. All firearms certificate holders and shotgun certificate holders are fed in by Force to a specific database and there is a designation on it against the Force of the type of certificate, so if someone from Dumfries and Galloway would show John Smith D and F if they had a Firearms Certificate, and if that certificate at any time had been refused or revoked, there would be a designation R against the individual.

So if he applies and was never granted a Firearms Certificate, that would be noted on the system? - Could you explain "never been granted"?

Yes; if a person applies for a Firearms Certificate and never gets one, in other words his application is refused, will that show up? - It should. If there was a formal process of refusal, that should be entered by the Force and that should be logged as an R.

That rather suggests that if it is withdrawn,/ withdrawn, having been made and withdrawn because of police objection or concern, it wouldn't necessarily show up? - I think within the process there will be a number of people who don't fulfill conditions in terms of good reason, and these applications may never in fact be progressed as formal applications, so it will deal with formal applications.

Does the police national computer tell me if I check there whether the named individual has a Firearms Certificate? - The PNC wouldn't; the SCRO register would.

So if I am responsible for recording someone's driving convictions of a fairly serious nature, drink driving, failing to stop, giving a false name, indicators of lack of trustworthiness, and I do this on a couple of occasions because he is caught a couple of times, and disqualified, and I enter that record, it will never be associated with the evidence that that person also holds a Firearms Certificate? - A disqualified driver would -- if somebody has a Firearms Certificate, and became a disqualified driver, then that should emerge as a part of either pending cases within the local record system or the SCRO system.

Let's say we have got past the stage of pending and there is a conviction, so presumably it disappears from the pending cases in SCRO and it comes up on PNC as a conviction and with a disqualification, that system doesn't at the moment reflect the fact that the convicted individual also has a Firearms Certificate? - For a road traffic conviction, it wouldn't at the moment. For road traffic convictions in the future, my understanding would be that when they are in-put to SCRO, the same configuration would apply.

I am concerned to explore the PNC a bit further. I take it that if a person appears on PNC as for example wanted for some offence, that's something you would expect the enquiring officer or rather the entering officer, the person responsible for the entry, to put into it if he knew it that that suspected person held a Firearms Certificate, or would that not be anticipated? - It may not be entered. It would depend on the circumstances, if it was seen as relevant to the situation.

It/

It sounds like something that automatically should go on. Is there some particular reason why it is difficult to do that?
- No. I couldn't honestly comment on specific circumstances, but where someone was wanted and they were in possession of firearms, then I would expect that to be entered.

And indeed, a refusal or a revocation having occurred should also be entered. Do you agree? If the fact is known that a particular person who is wanted for something has previously either been refused a Certificate or has had one revoked.....? - It may in fact be covered from another direction because if the reason for revocation or refusal related to the individual's behaviour, there is a warning signal capacity that somebody is violent for example on the PNC, so it could surface in that direction, although not specifically related to the revocation of a Firearms Certificate, and could I just say that in looking at databases, the key in-put really for the firearms history has become the SCRO database, and that has many of the cross references which you described in fact.

The thing that I am exploring with you, and the reason I am exploring it with you, is that at the moment there is an absence from SCRO of a record of certain driving offences, including disqualification? - Yes.

I appreciate what you have said about that changing? - Yes.

But the situation has got to be dealt with at present?
- But I think that it has to be seen in the operational context, that serious road traffic convictions lead to disqualification, and disqualified drivers are on the PNC database. That is a point within the configuration.

But the fact they hold a firearms licence or have had a licence application refused or a licence revoked, doesn't show up in relation to that conviction, and that, I am suggesting to you, is unfortunate? - Yes; I think there is scope for developing data on this.

If I can move away from that to the enquiring/enquiring process itself, we have been looking at areas where clearly uniformity is desirable. When it comes to carrying out a firearms enquiry in relation to an application, is there something to be made, do you think, from a uniform approach throughout the country? - I think the aim has been to achieve that. The 1991 Report to which we referred earlier in fact seeks to promulgate good practice and states a set of standardised steps that our Forces are encouraged to follow.

So you agree that uniform guidance to enquiring officers, whoever the enquiring officers may be, in the longrun would be desirable? - Yes. I think many people would suggest that uniform guidance at present exists in the form of the Home Office Guidance Document, and allied to that, the good practice document that came out.

But when you get down to it, what you have to do as an enquiring officer is fill up a form or make a report of some kind to your superior officers, or whoever is going to make the decision; is that right? - Yes.

And we have seen examples in this Inquiry of forms that are used, the Central Police forms in particular, which are called RL3a Forms? - Yes.

Have developed over the period -- we have seen three sets of these forms during the Inquiry. It might be an idea to have front of you a blank one of these, which is D18L, which will be shown to you. It is in Volume 2 of L. Now, you have probably never seen this document, but my reason for putting it in front of you is to let you see that guidance is actually given to the police officers who have to complete the form; do you see that? - Yes.

Particularly Question 2 there, "What are the applicant's reasons for requiring the firearm(s) or ammunition for which the application is made? If for competition, applicant must be a member of a Club. If for sport, applicant must have land permission. Specify reasons for each firearm". The problem of course is that this is the guidance that is in the hands of the enquiring officer at the time the enquiry is being made, and no doubt it tends/tends to take on a significance at that stage. Now, would it be helpful, do you think, if the form contained more guidance for the officer at that stage, or do you think it is adequate that the guidance is held in a big book that is kept in one of the police offices? - I think it is frankly very difficult to speak to the form out of the context of any training the officers had, or the accessibility of the Home Office Guidance. I think if somebody is doing an enquiry for a grant or renewal, the clear recommendation made in the Home Office Guidance is that this is a complex area and therefore the guidance should be made available to officers who are conducting enquiries. It is difficult to isolate the form from the background. I think anything that can be done to improve awareness and improve efficiency in any form is worthy of consideration, but I don't know the context within which Central would progress this and what access the individual would have.

I think in fairness to you, from what you have said already, if a civilian officer is making enquiry, the words on the form are largely unnecessary. You would expect him to follow a routine every time he did it, and the form becomes more important when you are looking at an enquiry carried out by whatever beat officer was available on the day to be assigned the enquiry.

If you look at that latter situation, do you think it might be very unhelpful to face that officer with a form which has limited guidance such as question 3 "Firearms held. Must be physically checked by Inquiry Officer". Now, do you think that sort of guidance could be misleading to an officer? Is that adequate, taken along with all the things below, which are quite detailed, because it leaves plenty of space to put in further information? - I think the intent is clear enough from the wording, that it must be physically checked by the officer to presumably verify it is of the make and calibre that is on the certificate. I find it difficult to comment beyond that.

So I take it that you have not got any particular thoughts on whether there might be something to be said for the guidance being incorporated in some more detailed way from the form itself? - The first point I would like to make is that I would find it difficult to criticise this form out of context.

I'm only giving that as an example? - The second point is, that as a principle yes, if you can improve the professional approach -- and there are ideas for that -- then they ought to be considered, and if a satisfactory form of summarised guidance can be incorporated, that is an option. The only point I would make is that guidance is probably no substitute for training, in having an awareness of what has to be looked at. It is one thing to have very detailed guidance for the Enquiry Officer, but if he doesn't know what is self-loading, manual or whatever, it doesn't compensate for that defect.

I see that. On the other hand, if you look at the first question, which is concerned with the suitability to hold a firearms certificate, the answer that is required is really yes or no? - Yes.

And the only guidance as to how you check up on that is a reference to PNC and SCRO computer checks? - Yes.

One would be worried would one not as to how/how the Enquiry Officer would find out whether or not he was a suitable person to hold a firearms certificate? - I would hope a professional police officer at operational level would know there are certain issues of unsound mind and intemperate habits would prohibit someone from acquiring a weapon. I would hope they would have an awareness as to what that question meant.

Do you know if thought has been given recently to devising a uniform enquiry form such as this? - There has been consideration given within the Firearms Administration Officers' Conference from time to time regarding improving information forms, but whether that extends to the enquiry form I couldn't comment.

Do you know if Mr. Bennett would be the man to ask? - He may be more up-to-date than I am; he may have more up-to-date knowledge.

One of the big issues for renewal as well as grant is the good reason a person has for having a weapon. So far as this Inquiry is concerned, that is a reason for a handgun? - Yes.

Do you approach this on a general basis, in other words whether an applicant has a good reason for having handguns, or do you look at the situation in relation to each individual weapon as a matter of practice? - The law requires us to look at each situation on its merits. It is my understanding there is a fairly clear view that Chief Officers should not be seen to be fettered in their discretion. In practical terms, however, there is very limited cognisance given to reasons outwith being a member of a club for the use of or the possession of handguns. This in my experience would be limited to perhaps a veterinary surgeon, who requires a handgun as a slaughtering instrument.

We have had a number of witnesses at the Inquiry who have held a number of guns, not just one. What is the general police approach to persons having weapons for target shooting, more than one? - There is no general approach. The guidance is fairly explicit in relation to the number of firearms and ammunition, that each circumstance should be considered on its merits. There is no specific case that there is an arbitrary limit.

Does/

Does that mean that the "good reason" test should be applied to each weapon? - In my view in practice that would be the approach. If someone is involved in a range of shooting disciplines, as the law stands and as convention stands, if they can offer that as the reason for acquiring it it would in all probability in most Forces I think be granted, because "good reason" has been shown, and there is no concept in the guidance of an upper limit, on the proviso that conditions are met in regard to sufficiency.

In practice how does a police officer check up whether a person has a good reason for why he wants two weapons which seem to be the same? - That could emerge from an enquiry in relation to their membership and activity at the club of which they are a member.

BY LORD CULLEN: I don't quite follow that. How does an enquiry of the club help? - In the sense that the discipline they are using the firearm for is a legitimate practice at the club. I couldn't comment on someone having several weapons all of the same calibre for the same purpose.

Your starting point would be finding out if there was another discipline to which the second gun was related; is that right? - Yes.

Then you would need to check up that the club had got the facility and had practised that particular discipline? - That is correct.

What about the idea of a spare? - Well, again in individual circumstances that may be seen as legitimate, but if the gun is in for repair or there is some technical defect, if the individual is engaged legitimately in competition shooting he may be able to advance an argument for a spare.

Supposing there is nothing amiss with number one gun but he wanted to have a spare just in case. Now, is that legitimate? - I think it is difficult to say that it would not be. If the individual is a competition shooter and advances the reason why he requires those firearms to participate in his sport, I think most Chief Officers would try to err towards caution in allowing a large number of firearms to accumulate, but I do think it is difficult/difficult to ascribe to those situations a lack of good reason. One of the big difficulties is that we would argue that there is some uncertainty as to what constitutes good reason in many circumstances. I think we would welcome clearer codification of what "good reason" might mean. There has been a proliferation of innovative shooting practices in recent years, which could well be regarded as legitimate shooting activities by the shooting interests that we mentioned earlier, and that has spawned a range of weapons that we have felt uncomfortable with, and from time to time points have been raised. But I think there is a lack of specification, and individual judgements have to be made.

Do you think perhaps as it is as slackly viewed as you say, that if you can justify the use of a weapon as a target shooting weapon, even though you have a couple of identical weapons, a police officer would find it difficult to say that was not good reason? - I think that would be fair comment in any circumstances.

BY LORD CULLEN: Just one point that you can clear for me. When we talk about "good reason" we seem to get into the area of need, but the guidance refers to the word "opportunity"? - In relation to the Act that is correct, it mentions "opportunity".

For instance, talking about a spare a moment ago you began talking about need? - That is correct.

Is that the criteria? Is it "need" as opposed to "opportunity"? - Well, I think that it may come down to both. It is need, really, in relation to other firearms, that someone needs a .22 rifle for vermin control. It is interesting that the guidance referring to handguns mentions "opportunity". We argue in our evidence that these instances ought to be dealt with in relation to justifying the need quite emphatically by raising the category of all multi-shot weapons to that of prohibited weapons, where the standard there would be very clearly need. They would have to justify a very clear need to justify a multi-shot weapon or a proliferation of weapons of that type in relation to target shooting. I think there is a practical difficulty/

This is talking about the future: but taking matters as they stand, in relation to the first gun as opposed to the gun that is to be the spare, does the applicant require to show need? - He has to show reason, and "reason" arguably in an interpretive sense could be both. If your reason for acquiring the second one is to provide back-up to give him a slightly different technical advantage from a gun -- I am not a technical expert on firearms, but it is my understanding that shooters will tailor guns in certain ways to give them advantages within the same calibre, and an identical firearm may have technical differences. In both circumstances I would suggest they could be interpreted as reasons for acquiring that type of firearm.

Supposing the applicant wanted authority to process a weapon, and it was perfectly clear that he had full opportunity to use that weapon, but the information indicates he had not got the slightest intention of exercising that opportunity: what would the officer do? - In my experience, if someone is not an active shooter, in that situation we would not renew an individual's certificate. We would check at the point of renewal that there was still a certificate of membership, and if it came to notice that the individual was not active we would tend not to renew the certificate, because the reason would have gone.

So you would want to make sure he had not merely an opportunity but intended to exercise it? - Yes, that would be the test. I think, sir, there is perhaps a practical difficulty, in that if you follow the good practice memo No. 91, the inference there is that where circumstances do not appear to have changed -- where there is no notice of change in a person's circumstances -- it is entirely possible that an individual could have a lapsed activity. He or she could still be a member of a club, for instance, but albeit they have got a certificate of membership and that has been renewed regularly you would not necessarily know how active they were. This is why again -- I don't want to stray into the future -- that is why I think there is a weakness here in relation to feed-back from clubs and club activity, that people are still active/active shooters.

What I want to understand is what is the approach today in dealing with applications, particularly in relation to the term in the guidance "regular opportunity". Do you say in general in Scotland that is taken as meaning that the opportunity is exercised?

- I couldn't really say what is generally understood in Scotland. From my local experience, we would check that the individual was a legitimate member of a club, that they were active at the time of grant and at the time of renewal, that they were still members of the club, and I think that is as far as that enquiry would go.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY:

Can I take it from that answer that if the person was still a member but was not actually shooting you are unlikely to find out at the renewal state the way things operate at present? - I think there is a possibility that could arise, unless the membership had lapsed, and there would be degrees of activity.

That may be because there is no real guidance given at the moment on the extent to which to check up on the applicant. There is no positive guidance that a particular check up should be made at the club on the shooting activity of the individual applicant?

- No. In the other type of certificate, in the sense of any other category of use, whether it is a club or not -- we are focusing on the opportunity in a club as a general point at renewal.

For a handgun it could only be at a club? - Yes, absolutely.

Just one or two quite separate matters to try to expand our knowledge of the situation at present and what might exist in the future. A number of suggestions have been made in submissions about where weapons might be kept rather than at home. There are expressions of opinion that storing guns in one location, building up an arsenal of weapons at one location, presents certain risks. The police might be in a particularly good position to tell us what the risks are and how the police perceive these risks. Can you help us? - Our view is that the retention of handguns at home should be discouraged, and they should be stored on the club premises, / premises, and clear guidelines as to how they may be transited between venues in secure circumstances. We raised the point in the context of what we would see as a reduction in the number of handguns. There is a counter-view from the Superintendents' Association of England and Wales that these represent a security risk if you centralise firearms and ammunition holdings in a club: but in context, we would see our recommendations would be valid in reducing the number of handguns being used, thereby reducing the numbers which would be centrally held.

We would also draw a parallel with firearms dealers, where there are significant amounts, significant quantities of firearms and ammunition held at fixed points and under secure conditions: but pending that we would recommend a proper and full evaluation of the security measures necessary both for dealers and for clubs, to ensure the maximum security. We would find that would be a valid possibility, removing handguns from the home.

Let's turn to the possibility of storage of the weapons at clubs. Taking account of the numbers involved does that present a significant risk? - We do not think it does, in comparison with the risk of firearms being readily accessible at home. We think the answer is to make the security commensurate with that risk, in the same way as with a firearms dealer.

What if an alternative approach was taken, and the guns and the ammunition were separated, so that the ammunition was stored at the club, presenting less of a security risk, and the gun was taken home? - That would depend on how you could clearly separate the ammunition from the firearm. I am not sure that is absolutely achievable.

Why do you say that? - I suspect that with home loading as currently exists there is an opportunity to acquire unregulated quantities of ammunition. You could never be absolutely certain that illicit ammunition might not be available for a firearm. There is the issue of carelessness within the system, and there is the issue of deceitfulness within the system, and there is another economy in relation to firearms beyond the one we are talking about, where illicit people may acquire ammunition.

I am concerned to some extent obviously about the use to which weapons and ammunition are put by criminals. If the proposal you are making of keeping guns in a club were to be implemented, what improvement would you see as a result so far as the prevention of weapons getting into the hands of criminals is concerned? - I didn't suggest that as necessarily an improvement in removing criminal use by diverting firearms out of criminal use. What we are suggesting is that it minimises the risk of aberrant behaviour by a recognised certificate holder in whatever circumstances. It is a public safety measure given, as we have discussed, there will be many people who so long as we have a regulated process, within the limitations of any process we may devise, whose behaviour may never be absolutely predictable and to that extent our contention is that where you have handguns I think there is a particular risk. If the users of handguns are continuing to argue a need for access to those weapons then I think our contention would be that those concealable weapons, those multi-shot weapons ought not to be in people's homes but to be at a well regulated point of control.

Do you see any criminal dangers posed by home loading? - I think there is a clear potential there. I mean, if people can acquire materials for making ammunition which is currently unregulated then anything is possible I suppose, sir, in that respect.

So it is not the home loading which is a problem? It is that people can acquire all the individual components without a Firearms Certificate? - I think you need to look at the question of home loading as a concept. If the individual meets all the criteria for a Firearms Certificate then there is a case for regulating it and thereby being a matter under control, where there would be notions of what the quantities ought to be and some means of control over that with regard to access to smokeless powder and the other components which would be transparently controllable or more transparently controllable.

Now, one thing I should have asked you about in relation to applications when we were looking at counter signatories was whether you saw any/any advantage in applications for Firearms Certificates being publicly advertised before they are determined? - There are public interest benefits in the sense that in other forms of licensing, liquor licensing for example, the individual has to announce that he has the intent to acquire or vary the practice with licensed premises. If someone in a community street seeks to obtain a weapon then you could understand the argument that people in that community are entitled to express some kind of view about that.

I know, sir, and you might want to pursue it with my colleague, Mr. Bennett, that this was given some very serious consideration in the working group which produced our evidence but we were persuaded on balance it perhaps attracted more attention to the individual than would be desirable. The counter argument to that clearly is well, if the weapon is not in the house then there is less of a problem in that respect but on balance they felt it was not something that we would choose to recommend. That is not to say we would oppose it. We just didn't find any level of support advanced at this time.

But if the gun is not kept at home then the public notice that the person has applied really does not present an additional security risk and gives people an opportunity to express a view about his suitability? - Yes, there is no objection or opposition to it. It is simply the climate of the way that the view was formulated, sir.

Do you see any advantage in having what has been described as a Central Gun Register? - Yes, we advocate that. There is a case for looking very carefully at the whole process with regard to firearms manufacture, distribution and certification.

You spoke of databases earlier, sir, and the need for comparability and correlation. There is really no way at present that you can guarantee you were successfully charting the route of a particular firearm because of the absence of accurate serial numbers on weapons and on magazines and the fact that some transactions disappear in the web of dealerships. The fact that people can perhaps go from site to site with knowledge of the shooting location being universally shared and we would see, sir, that careful evaluation of that type of/

of register which would link in the real history of a firearm from manufacturer to the break-up, with all the points of certification and transfer ought to be part of future strategy.

But would that help? - It would help, sir, because really we are going through a process of regulating individuals and specifically weaponry without any real reference point to identify weapons throughout their lifetime. There is a gap in the information system regarding that whole process. There is no way of knowing at the moment for sure just how many firearms globally are in circulation. If we are looking at issues of public safety then we would feel that there ought to be some notion of the sort of ceilings there might be in relation to the circulation of firearms. It is a difficult task to be able to assess just how many weapons globally people would have as technology stands.

There are two obvious problems and no doubt there are many more but one is that there are no unique serial numbers at the moment for weapons? - Yes.

Now, would that present a problem to having a Central Gun Register? - Only, sir, if there is not a will to overcome that problem. I mean, if the assumption is that is the way it has to be because the manufacturers operate that way then clearly there is a difficulty but if as part of any reform process improvements are made in identification of firearms then that problem would be overcome.

The other obvious difficulty is at present there is no means of keeping track of transactions of firearms where a dealer purchases a firearm, is that right? - That is the point I was making, sir, that there would be a reference on an individual certificate when a weapon was acquired by an individual certificate holder. That would be part of the arena we would see being embraced within a National Register.

Does the dealer record in his register when he has purchased a firearm? - It is my understanding that transactions are logged day by day.

But/

But he doesn't need to report that to the police? - Not at the point of transfer. It would be picked up in inspections of the log if they were looked at.

BY LORD CULLEN: Are you suggesting what is on the log would come on to this register? Is that right? - If an individual certificate holder goes to a dealer, sir, and transfers his weapon to that dealer then the dealer will in fact have that recorded as a transaction.

Yes, I appreciate that but are you suggesting what the dealer records ought to appear in the register in some form or other? - Yes, the new register?

Yes, on this new register we are talking about? -
Yes, for completeness of the transfer of firearms.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY: The only other question I want to ask you about is something which is mentioned again in your submission and that is a problem you see in relation to the British Visitor Permit scheme. Now, there has been introduced a scheme for European Firearms Passes? - Yes.

Now, can you help us identify the particular problem?
- Yes, very briefly sir.

It is at 2.2.261 of your submission I think? - Yes, if you bear with me just a moment. Can you give me a page reference, sir?

Page 59? - Thank you. Yes, there is a document known as the European Firearms Pass which every resident within the European Community should obtain from his local police if he plans to transit firearms around the European Community but there is no real control over these movements within the Community apart from Britain and that is because of an over-arching scheme, the British Visitors Permit. Now, the British Visitors Permit is required for everyone visiting the U.K. who wishes to bring into the country firearms. Its application, sir, would be for example to shoot on estates where shooters from the Continent might come in the season as tourists for shooting as recreation. In order to allow/allow them to bring their weapons with them then a sponsor can obtain a permit from the local Chief Constable and that would specify the weapons they were entitled to bring.

So you are saying that is a good thing? - We say it is a good idea because if we try to ensure public safety and control there is a lack of harmonisation of definition of weapons throughout Europe and weapons in the shotgun category that we have raised to Part 1 status or indeed prohibited status may well be freely available in other countries and in our view it would be anomalous if people could enter Britain and use firearms and types of firearms in ways which we would never address as good reason for certificate holders in the U.K. So for that reason, in simple terms we argue that that is an over-arching scheme and the British Visitors Permit has some merit in extending the standard form of regulations to the use of firearms in the U.K., being a higher standard of control than simply a pass which allows the shipment of weapons around the E.C.

Do you accept that has to be a question of how the Directive is actually interpreted and what it actually does achieve? - Well, I'm not an expert on European law but I have an understanding that much has yet to be done in achieving harmonisation within the Directive.

Is there evidence of weapons coming into the country because of the European pass scheme that would not normally be held by a person resident in this country? - There are examples of multiple action shotguns being brought in as shotguns when they should be Part 1 firearms and being used for example for killing geese when we would not regard that as a good reason for acquiring that type of weapon for that purpose.

BY LORD CULLEN: Just one or two matters before you are further questioned. You were asked some questions about the Scottish Criminal Records Office. Am I right in understanding that the records we talked about so far are concerned with individuals but they do have a record of firearms that have been lost or stolen, is that right? - That is correct, yes.

And/

And how is that arranged? Is it by reference to the serial number or how is the information displayed? - It would contain such information, sir, as is available regarding the weapon, its type, its calibre and its serial number.

And presumably location? - And its source of origin, yes, and the nature of the theft.

And that would obviously be used in the question of crime detection? - Yes, that is correct.

As far as the idea of a national database of firearms, is the main purpose of that to do with crime prevention or crime detection? - I think it would have a bearing on crime prevention. At the moment for example it is being linked to more rigorous controls elsewhere but someone could for example with a shotgun simply destroy the weapon, claim they have destroyed it and we would never find it again. It may have gone into the illicit economy on the criminal side. We see it as twofold, sir. From the public safety point of view, which is the primary reason behind our thinking, it would give absolute control of the routing of a legitimate firearm from the point of manufacture to the point of legitimate destruction and we would hope that is thought through conceptually. It would provide a deterrent for syphoning off firearms into the criminal economy and it would also give us a much more accurate measure of the range and types of weapons that are in circulation which we sadly lack at the moment.

Do you see it as supporting the process of certification that you discussed earlier? For example, if a gun turns up and it is known that somebody has been the holder of a Firearms Certificate in respect of that gun, may that be of some assistance in dealing with that particular case? - In the sense that there is an aberration with regard to the use of the firearm and the certificate?

Yes, supposing it is found out that a particular gun is used in the commission of a crime in one part of Scotland and it might be possible I suppose to find out that somebody is holding a certificate in respect of that? - Yes. I mean, that/that could be helpful, if not directly evidentially, from an intelligence point of view in the investigation of that case, sir.

Would that register we are talking about at the moment refer to Firearms Certificate holders? - We would see it being a complete relational database which would link a record of firearms to their current location and that might be a dealership, it might be that it has been destroyed. It might be that it is with a certificate holder so you would have a composite network of information which would embrace the whole firearms community.

So it would contain amongst other things information as to the name of the current holder in respect of that? - Yes, we would visualise it in that form.

Would it be possible to interrogate that register in order to find out whether a named person was in fact the holder of a firearm or would that be tackling it the wrong way round? - It would then almost become a kind of population database but the database should be capable of identifying people who are Firearms Certificate holders and because there would be a cross transference of information, we see it as being a database from which a number of applications could be drawn. We have not, to be frank, and I think this is brought out in our evidence, explored the mechanics of it, the complete functionality of it. We see it as a concept which could add some worthwhile part to the overall control of firearms.

You see, in addition to the suggestion of a database of firearms, I have also heard a suggestion there should be some national database of persons who either hold or have held or have applied for Firearms Certificates or the like, including people who have had them refused or revoked as the case may be. Now, that is not what we are talking about at the moment? - To take regard of that, sir, yes.

Do you see a use in the idea of a national database of persons who have been in some way or other linked to the Firearms Certificate system, whether a holder, a past holder, revoked, refused and so on? - There could be merit in it. My initial/initial response to that, particularly from the point of view of having a national history with regard to those who have been refused or revoked, I think that could be helpful because people are grouped around the country from time to time as they move and it would be a much more accurate database than has hitherto been available.

Can you tell me anything in relation to the point about what kind of information is held by individual Forces? I imagine that most Forces hold information about Firearms Certificate holders on computer, is that right? - Yes, most Forces now do. I think one till recently didn't have it but I think that is at an advanced stage. I think that is an interesting point, maybe worthy of note, that the guidance from the Home Office does not suggest any standard approach to record holding and I think also it is fair to note that perhaps advances in this area have not gone as fast as they should have because of the diversion of consideration of the Firearms Control Board in the mid-1990s but Forces have got administrative databases which will provide a register of Firearms Certificate holders, Shotgun Certificate holders and we have a knowledge of the certificate system whereby serial numbers, calibres, etc., are available within each Force.

But does the database include information about those who have had their Firearms Certificates revoked or refused? - I couldn't give an absolute answer to that, sir, because I don't deal with specific applications. Ours would be a purely administrative database but it would be, if I could define it, a dead record section which would give us any cross reference check but I couldn't speak with any authority for the other Forces.

If we were thinking about the future, what records on each firearms holder are they capable of communicating to each other or is that not possible? - At this point, no, but when I was speaking to Mr. Bonomy earlier I did mention the Scottish ISIT strategy and that is certainly very much part of the plan there, that there will be firearms applications which would allow for interaction across the Forces.

Are the systems in fact compatible at the moment? - They would not necessarily be compatible at the moment. I think it depends on the hardware and/

and the software. Most of the information is by far, probably in the vast majority of the time entirely of local interest. The vast majority of the data would not necessarily need to be cross-transferred but we could see I think as a professional service looking to the future that there would be an advantage in having that facility.

Can I take it that as between one Force and another there would not necessarily be a uniform approach as to what records should be held and in what form? - No, because there has been no standing point of guidance in relation to that but I would think that there would be a degree of commonality since certain of the information is fairly self-evident, sir.

Do I take it from what you have said that you would expect moves towards uniformity and inter-linking? - Yes. I think that it is the policy of the ACPOS to advance a strategy of uniformity and commonality which will give us a common benefit.

CROSS/

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. CAMPBELL: I think you have the joint submission before you? - Yes.

I understand you are not able to take us through this document and I don't intend to take up a lot of time on it, but can I ask for clarification of one or two recommendations? - Certainly.

In the submission, could you turn first of all please to Pages 70 and 71? - Yes.

At the top of Page 71, the second recommendation is that "The law be changed so that all applications for a Firearms Certificate for a handgun for target shooting be granted for single-shot .22 inch calibre weapons only". The next recommendation is that "All multi-capacity smooth bore guns be raised to the prohibited category"? - Yes.

There is then a reference to Section 5 of the Act, and then the next recommendation is that "All multi-shot pistols be raised to the prohibited category". Bearing those recommendations in mind, can I ask you also to turn to Page 48? - Yes.

Here, the submission has been discussing Clubs and the like, and at the bottom of the page, we read the following recommendation -- "All semi-automatic weapons and ammunition (whether belonging to the Club or a member) be stored at the Club"? - Yes.

On the face of it, it may be thought -- I am really just asking this for your clarification -- it may be thought that there is an inconsistency between on the one hand the recommendations at Page 71? - Yes.

Which raised multi-shot weapons to the prohibited category and prevent Firearms Certificates for such weapons for target shooting? - Yes.

But on the other hand, making your recommendation relating to the storage of such weapons at the Club? - Could I perhaps explain? I/

I can understand the ambiguity on first reading. What we are recommending is that semi-automatic weapons, multi-shot weapons, be raised to the prohibited category and thereby need would require to be demonstrated to the Secretary of State for acquisition of such weapons. Were such approval given in limited circumstances, I would presume that would relate presumably to the target arena at shooting Clubs, then our recommendation follows that those weapons could be stored at home, but if people agree with our view, they should be stored with the other weapons at the Club, so that is the logic of it, that we are saying raise the multi-shot, multi-capacity weapons to their prohibited category, and if they are granted, their storage would be on like terms with the other handguns at the Club.

Would you envisage perhaps stricter controls in relation to what would amount to a good reason to have use of a semi-automatic handgun for example? - Yes. I would think that is very much in the mind of the Associations and the group, that the majority of Olympic sports, as I understand it, revolve around .22 weaponry, and as I understand it, almost exclusively could be fulfilled with a single shot weapon. I also believe that some international shooting competitions which are not of Olympic standard have diversified in the nature of events, and it is that particular area, I believe, that the greater capacity for a weapon is more likely to be needed, so I think it would be fair to say that we envisage that there would be a much greater restriction on that type of.....

Would this be part of the scheme to bring about a reduction in the overall number of such weapons in our society today? - That's the view we took. Our reasoning, if it is helpful, to the Tribunal, was that we debated the case for an absolute ban within the Group, but felt that there was a group of people who, for legitimate sporting purposes, could argue a reason to acquire a handgun. We then looked at that and thought what the standard ought to be, and it is achievable -- a balance is achievable if we limit it to .22 single-shot weaponry rigorously controlled with the safeguards, and that greater capacity weaponry be raised to prohibited status.

So if we revert to the top of Page 71 to make/make sure that I am following the suggested scheme, the second top recommendation is that "All applications for a Firearms Certificate for a handgun for target shooting be granted for single-shot .22 inch calibre weapons only"? - Yes.

Does that in effect mean that private ownership of firearms or handguns, if I can put it that way, would be so limited, and if one wanted to use a semi-automatic weapon for target shooting disciplines which required such weapons, then you would require to use a weapon owned by your Club? - In effect, that would be the case.

And it would follow that that weapon would require to be stored at the Club? - Correct.

So the effect would be that private ownership of handguns would be limited in accordance with the recommendation at the top of Page 71? - That is correct, yes, to the individual certificate holder, yes.

So in terms of weapons overall, that would mean, would it, that you would envisage private ownership being limited to shotguns, some form of rifles presumably, and handguns as defined as "Single-shot .22 inch calibre weapons and" only? - Yes, of which we believe there are approximately 500 certificated at present of that type as opposed to, I think, 10,000 handguns in total.

So you are seeking to bring about a change in that ratio? - That is the aim, yes.

In terms of rifles, what form of types of rifle would be permitted in terms of private ownership under this scheme? - In relation to rifles, there is a residual category of multi-shot rifles which ought, we think, to be in the prohibited category. I couldn't give figures for it, but we would say that the type of rifle would be the type of weapon that is legitimately used at the moment for sport in relation to deer; by the farmer in relation to vermin; with the types identified there, those multi-shot types of weapons, similarly being taken into the requirement to prove need against a prohibited category of firearms.

Moving away from the specific terms of these recommendations and bearing in mind that there are/

are those who take a different view and would contend that private ownership and possession of handguns should continue much as present, one then requires to address, does one not, any appropriate changes in the present system of regulation and control of such handguns, and the ownership of them? - Yes.

Would you agree that any system which seeks to provide public reassurance in the light of the allowance of private possession of handguns at home, any such system should be a rigorous one? - Yes. I think there are two points, if I might make them? Firstly, I think about 2 per cent of the population or less involve that particular group to which you refer, so we would argue that some form of balance in the equation needs to be carefully considered with regard to where priorities lie in respect of future regulation, but if that balance falls somewhere between what we propose and others would argue for, then clearly we have argued for some time that reforms are needed in the Firearms Regulation and Control, and improvements are required.

Let's assume just for the sake of discussion that in the future, private possession of handguns at home is permitted, plainly the objective of any more stricter controls or stricter regime which may be brought in would be to improve the prospect of preventing another Dunblane tragedy? - Yes.

And the essence of that, I take it, would be to improve the prospect of identifying people who may do these awful deeds? - Indeed, yes.

Putting it shortly, the system, any system requires to address the potential for other Hamiltons in our society? - Indeed, sir.

I don't think anybody in this Inquiry has suggested that it is possible to identify a system which will prevent another Hamilton on the assumption that private possession is permitted? Would you agree with that general statement? - I think it is very difficult. I think human behaviour being what it is, it is a sad fact that unimaginable aberrations can arise, and if there are opportunities for access to weapons, then that can have tragic consequences.

12.20 p.m.

But no doubt if we could proceed on the hypothesis which underlies this whole line of questioning, that private possession of handguns would have permitted semi-automatics and what have you, then given the need for a rigorous system with a view to improving the prospects of identifying unsuitable people before something terrible happens, the essence of any such improved system, as I think you have indicated, is based upon more rigorous checks, perhaps more frequent checks; is that correct? - Yes. I think it is open to consideration that in evaluation of the future requirements, we would contend that a five yearly turn-round is far too long a period to elapse before there is some structured review of someone's status with firearms, and we would recommend three years, as was the case until recently.

But on any view, any new system which seeks to improve the prospects of identifying another Hamilton before it is too late would involve a more pro-active regime, a more expensive, more time-consuming and a more extensive regime? - Yes: and it would mean we would argue more active players within the community who have a contribution to make.

Even then, even with these more pro-active people in the community playing their part, more regular checks, greater efforts being taken, even then the potential still exists for the same thing to happen again? - I believe it is impossible to predict human behaviour to that level of precision. You cannot absolutely guarantee that an individual is not going to indulge in some extreme act, as long as they have access to firearms; that potential must always exist if they have free access to any form of weapon.

So this may be another factor pointing in support of your submissions proposal severely to limit the nature of weapons held at home? - We believe so. I don't want to say this in any callous sense, but what we are really saying is that if something aberrant happens, at least we have reduced the capability for the most extreme consequences by limiting access to single shot weapons.

Moving/

Moving the discussion on just a little, you told us earlier or we discussed earlier various Home Office-inspired proposals for change before Dunblane occurred, for example postal renewals, doing away with counter-signatories and the like. Does that suggest that by the early 1990s the memory and effect of Hungerford was beginning to fade already, by that stage? - I think there are those who would contend with some justification that the expectations of reform post-Hungerford were not fully realised in relation to the categorisation of weapons and the fulfilment of obligations with regard to certain types of shotgun, for example.

We point out that there has been a need since Hungerford for some far-reaching reforms.

The Firearms Consultative Group was set up after Hungerford, and the two ACPOS members of that submitted proposals in mid-1990, very similar to the proposals we have submitted here. Whether the images of Hungerford have faded I could not comment on. We as professional police officers can point to the fact that I think there has been a momentum towards improving administrative efficiency, which has had a greater priority in our meeting, than underlying issues of regulation.

You alluded to the costs of processing the Firearms Administration as absorbed by the Police Force. That is a costly process. There is a cost which is there. You can appreciate at one level the desire to make this system as administratively efficient as possible, therefore, but our concern would be that that has to be matched with an underlying concern that there is also regulatory effectiveness matching that administrative efficiency.

So you would understand that there may be a concern that if private possession of -- let's limit it for the sake of discussion to semi-automatic weapons. If private possession of semi-automatic weapons continues to be permitted, the counter-balance is some new improved, more rigorous regime by way of checking and the like, and you would understand the concern that in years to come, any immediate impact or effect of Dunblane might begin to fade, and administrative efficiency may once again come to the fore? - I think we have no difficulty in arguing for radical change.

Our whole presentation is based on the need to grasp the nettle once and for all, and if we are/

are to have a society which has access to firearms as part of its culture then that has to be very positively weighed against the perceived public safety, and a real change has to be engineered, and if costs are attached to that then that has to be borne within the system.

I think our evidence would fail if it did not achieve some recognition of the underlying need for that kind of change such as we propose. I do not think anything from our professional perspective which is perceived as half measures or incremental change would satisfy public safety, nor match our professional aspirations.

Would you agree, without in any way wishing to minimise the desirability of proper checks upon those who have access to firearms, that any move away from home possession towards more centralised storage of weapons perhaps along with a reduction in the overall number of weapons, in addition to being potentially safer might well be a cheaper system than would otherwise arise? - It certainly could be cheaper from a public expenditure point of view. It may be costly to the practitioners.

The parallel we have drawn in our evidence is the concern in relation to football stadia from a public safety perspective post-Hillsborough. We think there are some issues here that have to be made, that if there is a cost to be borne than that is part and parcel of this process of change, and that should be borne, where the cost needs to be met.

In that context I think you are probably referring perhaps to a passage in your submission, your joint submission, at page 47? - Yes, sir: paragraph 2.2.187.

Perhaps you would be good enough to read out the three bottom paragraphs, from 2.2.185 at the bottom of that page.

LORD CULLEN: Perhaps I can say something at this point. I have been concerned to try and bring about a situation in which the arguments on either side are carried essentially in writing, and Mr. Bonomy has led his evidence in order to deal with certain practical considerations. I would be anxious if your cross-examination developed into something/something other than that. I think it is best if we try to deal with this essentially in writing and concentrate on practical considerations, or possibly a question on clarification.

MR. CAMPBELL: I was not going to go into the matter in any detail.

LORD CULLEN: Otherwise we might as well turn the whole Inquiry into an oral examination.

MR. CAMPBELL: Thank you, sir. Is your lordship content with what I am doing at the moment?

LORD CULLEN: I'm not trying to close you off on any particular point, but that is the line I would propose to take.

CROSS-EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. CAMPBELL: Perhaps you could read the bottom three paragraphs? - Yes. Number 2.2.185 says "Scotland has a population of 5.1 million. At the end of 1995, there were 32,300 firearms certificates and 68,888 shotgun certificates on issue, a total of 101,100 certificates. Some of these will hold both types of certificates, so the total 'shooting community' in Scotland will be less. Shooters therefore represent less than two per cent of the population".

Paragraph 2.2.186. "Words such as 'inconvenient', 'uneconomical' and 'impractical' seem to us to fly directly in the face of the public safety principle, particularly today when the focus is not simply on ammunition but also on the firearms themselves."

Paragraph 2.2.187. "Following the Hillsborough Stadium Disaster in 1989, and the subsequent Inquiry by the Right Hon. Lord Justice Taylor, football clubs were ordered to bring their stadia up to certain standards. Questions of convenience, economy or practicality were cast aside. 10 years on, our football stadia are some of the safest world-wide, and the rumblings of bankruptcy from certain clubs in having to implement the new measures have not materialised. We draw a parallel here to show that radical change can be introduced despite orchestrated protests from vested interests, if public opinion is strong enough and Parliament so decides".

Is/

Is that the passage you were referring to a moment ago in the context of the Hillsborough disaster? - Yes.

In the next paragraph you make reference to the compulsory storage of firearms and ammunition at gun clubs, and you say that you are convinced that this is what the community at large want, and that they quite rightly want to feel safe and they want their children to be safe from the Ryans and the Hamiltons of this world, and the Parkhills? - Yes.

Who is Parkhill? - Parkhill was a young man who became involved in a firearms incident in Glasgow in the early 1990s. He had a history of possession of firearms on a certificated basis from a fairly early age, a shotgun certificate at 16 and a firearms certificate at 17. The evidence suggested that under the influence of drink he had an argument with someone, took a handgun from his home and started firing it in a public place, I think in the middle of Sauchiehall Street.

Now, that was a fairly dangerous incident. I think one person was killed and some others were wounded as a result. He then committed suicide.

You were asked some questions about the storage of weapons in a centralised place, by my learned friend Mr. Bonomy. I would like you to elaborate on one answer you gave to him, if you would? - Yes, sir.

You indicated to him that certain types of weapon could be confined to club premises, then I noted you as saying "With clear guidance regarding transit between venues", or words to that effect? - Yes.

So we are to understand that the shooter, his weapon is stored at the club, and then presumably he is going to shoot at some other venue? - Yes.

What did you have in mind by "Clear guidance regarding transit between venues"? - We make specific recommendation in the report to the fact that we see these weapons being secured in transit, and that there is some means of ensuring that/that it is for a legitimate reason when the firearm leaves the club premises.

We also in our appendix outline certain conditions in relation to clubs, and these are but an embryo of conditions.

There was a feeling within the Group that there was scope to elaborate on the control of weapons in transit between competitions, without having anything more specific to say than that.

I ask you this specifically, because we may hear evidence to the effect that this whole idea of centralised storage of weapons at gun clubs is a waste of time, because somebody such as Hamilton would simply pick up the gun from the club, and instead of going to the intended shooting range or other club simply go and carry out the murderous deed? - Well, there will always be a risk attached. But if there is controlled access to firearms within the more rigorous control of clubs I think we would almost have had in mind something akin to our own requirements that a police officer has to have authority to withdraw a firearm, and that is controlled.

I think we would envisage that there was some control measure within the club that would govern access to the firearm, so it was not a question, as has happened in the past, of someone having taken a firearm from a club to use at their own -- that is the kind of thrust we see, without having a codified set of proposals.

Finally, picking up a point raised by my learned friend Mr. Bonomy in the context of the potential for theft of weapons from some centralised armoury, has there been any consideration given to any benefits which may flow from disabling weapons in central storage by removing part of the firing mechanism? - That was one of the points we made. We recommend that there is a structured view of national standards for security of weapons in clubs.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. TAYLOR: When an applicant for the grant or renewal of a firearm certificate submits his application to the police, the police will not know whether that applicant has approached several people to be his counter-signatory and has been refused; is that fair to say? - That is correct. That is one of the disadvantages we see in the present system. There is/

is really no way of knowing at present as to how someone has come to be the counter-signatory. They would not know either necessarily that they were part of a queue, so to speak.

Three or four other people or more could have previously declined to counter-sign the application in the appropriate manner? - That could have happened, sir, yes.

Do you therefore see any merit in there requiring to be some declaration by the applicant that the person who has counter-signed is the only person who has been approached? - I am sure there is a value in that, that could be linked into an improved system of counter-signing referees, yes.

Taking it a little further, in the event of a false declaration being made, there being specific provision, might that lead to revocation or refusal of registration? - Yes, I think that would be a useful sanction to consider, so that there is real meaning to the process: but it does add value in a regulatory sense to the whole process.

You were asked some questions by Mr. Bonomy in relation to what constituted good reason? - Yes.

And in fairness to you it might be of benefit to you if you could have a copy of the Home Office guidance before you, which I think you will find in L Volume 2, and it is D1 of that Volume: have you got that? - Yes.

Can you have a look please at paragraph 6.8(e), which you will find on page 69? - Yes, sir.

I think that was the passage to which you were referred when answering questions in relation to "good reason"? - Yes, sir.

If an applicant states that he has an intention to shoot when his application for renewal comes up, do Police Forces generally to your knowledge carry out any checks during the currency of the certificate to ascertain if the intention is in fact being exercised? - There would be some follow-up I would think in my experience at the time of/

of grant, because for a time the individual would be in a probationary category. At the time of renewal, however, I think it would be fair to say that provided there was some current membership, it would be not usual for any further-ranging enquiry, although the individual would be seen in my own Force, and there would be a home visit, and there would be some guarantee elicited that he was still a member. Not only would the membership certificate be there, but it is my understanding that on one such occasion it was established that the individual was a dormant member, because the certificate was not renewed.

As things currently stand, however, if the "good reason" lapses between grant or renewal there is oddly no facility for revocation, as I believe the Tribunal is aware.

As a point of practice there would be a routine visit in my own Force to the individual, there would be confirmation he would be still a member of a club, but I would say it would not be usual for the club to be visited just to validate just what the level of his involvement would be, if he still appeared to be a bona fide member.

BY/

BY LORD CULLEN: But would he be asked whether he was active as a member? - That would be usual in my experience, that he would have a current membership certificate and as part of the validation process at that time the enquiry officer would be expected to at least confirm with the particular applicant that he was in fact so engaged.

CROSS-EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR.

TAYLOR: If at renewal an application indicated that he had not shot in the preceding five-year period because of domestic circumstances, pressure at work or similar but he still intended to shoot and wished to have the opportunity to shoot in the subsequent five-year period for which he was making application, would that satisfy the criteria for good reason? - I think again I can only localise that rather than make a general statement but I think we would look carefully as to whether good reason still in fact subsisted against those circumstances and as to whether in fact the certificate should simply not be renewed and whether points arise where the individual felt that he could operate a gun in a legitimate way considering the fresh application but such is the nature of the Act and the process I would be at pains to say that all of these things, if they arise, would be considered on their merits. My reaction to the hypothesis you gave is that we would look closely as to whether there was still a sustainable good reason for the certificate continuing.

Let's for the sake of the discussion postulate that the person had not shot for five years and indicated that he still intended to shoot. Or let's even change it and let's say he didn't intend to shoot but he said "I want the opportunity to shoot in the next five years". If I have understood you correctly, the officer who was making the enquiry would say "Do you intend to shoot?" and if their applicant is being honest, he will say no, he doesn't intend to shoot but he wants the opportunity. You would in those circumstances refuse the application? - No, what I said, sir, was that we would look carefully at the validity of the continuing good reason. If he was not actively taking the opportunity to shoot, if he was de facto a lapsed member, a dormant member, of a club, we have in the past revoked.....not revoked but failed to renew their certificate. If there was an argument, / argument, and again I am being hypothetical and just trying to be practical at the same time, if there was an argument that he intended within the five-year regime against those circumstances, my advice would be to ensure that that intention was fully validated. That would certainly be my view in these particular circumstances.

How would you validate that interpretation? - Then I think you would have a follow up with the club and the individual.

And what would you do if the intention was not materialising? - If the intention was not materialising, there is a difficulty in law in as much as, as I said, there is no power to revoke at present and that anomaly needs to be resolved, so I think there has to be almost good faith on both sides that that reason is going to be fulfilled.

Taking an extreme situation; where an applicant says "I don't intend to shoot, I simply wish to have the opportunity to intend to shoot and I thus have joined a club and I am a continuing member of that club", how would you be able to refuse that application for renewal within the terms of the guidance? - I think there is a difficulty if there is a strong argument from the individual that he wishes to exercise an opportunity because that is almost a practical impasse I would say.

So as long as the applicant indicates a desire to retain the opportunity to shoot and is a member of a club to demonstrate that he can fulfil that opportunity, you don't really have very much option but to grant the renewal? - There is not a lot of option but I think you have to not automatically go to renewal. I think you have to look more fully at the circumstances and you would look behind that statement with the scope to seeing how tenable a view that had been. If he had been inactive throughout or he had not acquired any of the weapons he sought to acquire then I think there is an issue there on the validity of the application. That is a personal view. I don't say that any other person would necessarily subscribe to that but it de facto seems as a dormant member and he is hanging on to authority to acquire a particular weapon with no clear intentions to acquire it, I think there is a test of good reason. That is a personal view. But if he is intending to exercise/exercise the entitlement that is conveyed in relation to the condition and the guidance, as you pointed out at (e), "Has regular and legitimate opportunity to use the weapon for target practice", I couldn't quote any case law on how that has been interpreted but this document is a guidance document. It is not a mandatory document. That has to be understood and as a Chief Constable I would certainly look behind the rationale of this individual before I would renew his certificate in any circumstances.

BY LORD CULLEN: Of course, the passage we are looking at, which is 6.8(e), really begins by telling you what you are not to do? - Yes, it should not be granted unless he has regular and legitimate opportunity.

But it doesn't tell you what the test is to be? - No. Going back, sir, to the point that was made earlier. There is an absence of definition of good reason.

It is a bit unfortunate there is so much discussion about what is meant to be a guidance document? - Yes, that is a fair point, your lordship.

CROSS-EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR.

TAYLOR: If the applicant had authority to possess and did in fact possess say three or four guns of different calibres, would you expect the enquiry officer to ascertain if the applicant was making use of each and every one of these weapons? - I think there is a need to demonstrate good reason for each of the weapons. In practical terms, that is with the applicant and enquiry officer. Again there may be a practical difficulty in wholly determining the extent of use. It might become obvious from exchanges in relation to ammunition for example. That might be one guide to it but there is I think again a practical point of good faith in relation to the applicant and the degree to which the enquiry officer can go behind that issue.

Because there would not be any way of checking whether or not a particular firearm, a particular gun, was being used by the applicant on a regular basis? - Not conclusively. Not conclusively, I don't think.

Because/

Because whilst clubs may keep checks on those shooting there from time to time, would I be correct in thinking they do not keep checks on the weapons which are shot on any occasion? - I wouldn't think there was any definitive record of that.

My colleague, Mr. Bennett, will be able to cast more light on that particular question, though.

RE-EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMOY: On the question of the private ownership of weapons, are you actually suggesting that people should not own their own weapons, quite apart from the question of where they are kept? - This, sir, was in relation to the automatic weapons and having them raised to the prohibited category.

Well, I am also thinking about what you suggest would be available target shooting weapons in the ordinary course, that is the .22 weapon. Are you suggesting they should not be in private ownership? - No, I didn't suggest that.

That is all I wanted to be sure of? - No, for clarity, we saw them being certificated but we see prohibited weapons perhaps to be in a slightly different position.

GRAHAM BENNETT, (53), Sworn,

EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMOY: Are you the Depute Chief Constable of Fife? - Yes, I am.

How long have you held the post you presently hold?
- Five years.

How long have you been a serving police officer? - 33 years next month.

Can you take me through your years of service please.
Just a short summary? - Yes, I was a beat constable for three years and then I was a Traffic Officer in the Patrol Department for four years. I was then a detective constable for four years and then with 11 years' service I was promoted to detective sergeant. I was then after three years promoted to uniform Inspector and after a further one year I was promoted to Chief Inspector and then I was Chief Inspector in a sub-division for three and a half years and then I was promoted to Superintendent/

Superintendent rank for 11 months and then I became Chief Superintendent in 1984 as Divisional Commander for the Western Division of Fife Constabulary. In 1987 I was appointed to the post of Assistant Chief Constable in Fife Constabulary after having been Divisional Commander for three and a bit years. Then in 1991 I was appointed to my present post.

Now, has your whole service been in Fife? - Yes, it has.

In your present post do you have particular responsibility for firearms? - I have.

What are these? - I am the officer who is responsible for the issue, grant, renewal, revocation, refusal and consideration of all matters in relation to firearms and shotguns.

During the rest of your service did you have any responsibility in relation to firearms? - Yes, as Inspector I was responsible for firearms administration in a sub-division. As Chief Inspector I was responsible for the overall firearms administration. Then at Superintendent level and Chief Superintendent level in the absence of the Depute when I was the Assistant Chief Constable.

I think you are also a member of the body known as ACPOS? - I am.

And you have held the Chair, is it, of a sub-committee in connection with the particular subject we are dealing with, the submission they have made to the Inquiry? - That is correct, Mr. Bonomy. I am Secretary of the General Purposes Committee, my lord, and that General Purposes Committee deals with firearms issues and by virtue of my position on that Committee, which I have also held for five years, I was asked to Chair its working group on the joint submission of evidence to Lord Cullen. I also Chair the ACPOS sub-committee which is called the Administration Officers' Committee and that committee is, as I said, a sub-committee of the General Purposes Committee and we deal with matters relating to the administration of firearms in all Forces. We meet six monthly and I have some of the Minutes of these meetings with me if Mr. Bonomy wishes to see them or if Lord Cullen wishes to see them.

What/

What I want to do just now is to ask you about particular issues and the practical problems that arise from them and the first one I want to ask you about is the enquiry form that is used by Forces when they are making enquiry into an application for the grant, renewal or variation of a Firearms Certificate. Has any recent consideration been given to the idea that the forms used should be uniform throughout the country? - Yes, we have been in recent weeks looking at this but we have not taken this on board yet, Mr. Bonomy, and we think it is required to be taken on board and to have a standardised application filling in form for all enquiry officers, whether police or civilian.

The forms obviously pose certain questions or at least the ones we have seen pose questions. I take it that is in itself fairly uniform? - Yes, it is.

In your experience do the forms provide much guidance to the officers about the enquiries they are making? - Not really, no.

Do you think that is one area in which the forms could actually be improved? - Yes. We do for example in my Force have civilians. Our Department for the grant and renewal of firearms and firearms administration is totally civilianised so in the selection procedure we ensured that the people we chose had a previous life with an interest in guns or knowledge of guns and weaponry and explosives preferably but I do think there is a need for a checklist of questions to be asked instead of just the Yes or No situation.

So we are looking for more specification basically in the answers and more specification given in the guidance to the officer asking the questions? - That is correct. I have to add that while the checklists are mainly Yes or No there is nothing to preclude the officer, a police officer or civilian, from putting any further concerns or information alongside the Yes or No.

I think it may be recognised that the more experienced the officer is in relation to firearms the less guidance he might need but I'm concerned at the situation at the moment where in many Forces it is the beat constables who are being asked to conduct/conduct these enquiries. Now, as long as that remains the case do you see force in the idea there should be more guidance given on the enquiry forms? - I do, yes.

Now, I intend to move on to the issue of appeals and the approach you take to appeals.

MR. BONOMOY: Sir, that might be best dealt with in the afternoon.

LORD CULLEN: Yes. We will resume at 2 o'clock.

After an adjournment for lunch.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY: As I said to you earlier, we will return to things which could give rise to an appeal, and I am thinking of refusing an application or revoking a certificate. I think in your present position, you have responsibility for taking these decisions? - I have.

How long has that been the case? - Five years as Deputy, and in the absence of the Deputy Chief Constable, between 1987 and 1991.

Before we actually get into refusal or revocation, can you tell me whether there are circumstances which do arise during the life of a certificate, in which action may be required, but that action is not revocation or refusal of an application for renewal, but it is something shorter really? - Yes; on occasions a file is brought to my attention by the officers under my command which gives them cause for concern, and sometimes when I look at that file, I issue that person, the applicant or certificate holder, with a warning letter.

Can you give me an example of when you would do that? - If the shotgun or firearms certificate holder, if it is brought to my attention that he has sustained a minor conviction or for example for drink driving with a low alcohol level, or for example if he has been convicted of a small breach of the peace, a minor breach of the peace, or an assault which is not serious, that has been disposed of probably in the District Court, and alcohol was not a tremendous issue, I would probably consider having regard -- I would look at all the papers and I would look at his previous record, and if his previous record was unblemished, I would consider giving that person a warning letter.

What sort of thing does a warning letter say to him? - Warning letters -- I do them fairly regularly, and it outlines that it has been brought to my attention that he is the holder of a certificate number such-and-such, or a firearms certificate/certificate number such-and-such, and it has been brought to my attention that on such-and-such a date that it was reported to me that he had committed a minor offence or committed an offence, or had done something which was not conduct which I expected of and someone having a shotgun or a firearms certificate, I would bring it to his attention that if there was any further aberration on his character or if he sustains any further convictions, I will without any further hesitation revoke his certificates.

One of the issues that is highlighted in the ACPO S and the joint submission is the distinction between renewal and revocation in relation to the question of a good reason, in other words you cannot revoke someone's certificate just because he has lost his good reason. In your experience, has that presented any practical difficulties in administering firearms in Fife? - The whole question of good reason causes me as a Chief Officer considerable difficulty, but I think what you are getting at is that at this moment, if someone is a member of a gun club, that he doesn't go shooting, and he has a firearms certificate, I cannot remove or revoke his firearms certificate because of lack of good reason, and in our evidence, we would wish that to be changed.

But have you come across situations where you felt you should be revoking it because of the departure or the loss of the good reason, but you have been unable to do it? - Yes, I have come across circumstances.

That is a practical problem? - Not an everyday problem, but it is a practical problem.

Now, there are obviously a whole variety of circumstances in which you might decide to revoke someone's certificate. Can I ask you, however, whether you have in the past revoked certificates because of behaviour which did not amount or which did not result in a conviction, but which you considered was such that revocation was the appropriate course? - I have, yes.

Can you give me any examples of that type of situation? - Yes; I have two or several examples I brought along with me, and I will not use names, but in 1993 I had a person applied for a shotgun/shotgun certificate, and he had previously held a shotgun certificate and did not renew it in 1986. The man was 70 years of age and I was not happy with the attendant circumstances of his application, and this, I said, was for a shotgun certificate. I had considerable enquiry made and had statements noted from all police officers who had been involved with this person, and he was a cat lover, and he had told police officers in previous years -- it had been noted in Intelligence and mentally -- that he was going to one day get a gun licence back and shoot these dogs that were tormenting and had killed one of his cats. However, that was in previous years, and in 1993 he applied for, and the police officer, a constable, made enquiry, and reported to me that he was not happy that this chap could provide a good reason for having possession of a shotgun, and one other supportive factor was that a member of his family was not totally overwhelmed with happiness that he was applying for a shotgun, and then the next stage was that I gave an Inspector an instruction to go and see him and discuss the matter with the applicant, and the Inspector then reported back to me that the applicant was short of breath; he lived up a stair; he had not sufficient -- in his opinion, in the applicant's opinion, he had sufficient security, but the Inspector's report indicated to me that the security was totally inefficient and insufficient, and the other factor to be considered was that he was breathless and he was very agitated when the Inspector challenged him about why he needed this. The end of the story was that I refused to grant him a shotgun certificate and subsequently went to an appeal before the Sheriff Court in Dunfermline in 1994 with this case, and I was asked to give my considerations, and I said that that was because he was 72 to 75, 72 years of age, and he would be 75 before the expiry of these certificates; he was breathless; he was anxious, agitated, shaking, and he was not then fit for his age, and I gave my evidence, and the police officers gave their evidence, and the Sheriff made a pronouncement that I had not acted improperly.

There is a number of factors in particular obviously that justify the decision you took. Do you have even from memory any examples where either refusal or revocation depended solely on someone's conduct, but there was no conviction? - Well, the one I have just spoken about was on conduct./

conduct. It was not on a conviction.

But it sounds as though, in addition, it depended on his being unfit to be entrusted with a firearm, and possibly because he was dangerous? - Yes.

And he didn't have a good reason either? - Correct.

So there were a number of factors there? - But he still felt so passionately about the fact he wanted a shotgun certificate that he took it to appeal. I had another one regarding a man from another part of the Force area who again previously held a shotgun and firearm certificate, and every time his life went into crisis, he did something; he tried to commit some form of injury to himself by taking of tablets or by taking of something else to hurt himself when a crisis came in his life, and he was diagnosed as having bipolar disease, which is a form of controlled schizophrenia, and he surrendered his firearm and shotgun certificate when he had one of these crises in his life some years ago. He had several warning letters from the Deputy of the day away back in the 1980s, so in 1983 he had filled in a form requesting renewal and he had said that he had suffered from no form of mental disorder, and as Deputy Chief Constable, I would like to say to you that I believe that this is a particularly difficult question because I have to satisfy myself as Deputy if someone suffers from a form of mental disorder, do they appreciate that they do suffer, or do they care to admit that they do suffer, so I had to consider this, is he aware that he suffers from a form of mental disorder? Anyway, this chap applied for a shotgun certificate some years later in 1993, and I refused it on the basis of his previous life, which I have described to you. The constable's report said that the applicant was not in a fit mental state at this moment to be the holder of any weapon, and he felt it was unlikely in this situation that this would change in the foreseeable future. However, his doctor, who I engaged to tell me in confidence -- I got a certificate signed by the applicant to allow me to approach his doctor -- his doctor said that he was under prescribed medicine for his illness, and at present -- I underline at present -- his mental state is stable and is under regular review, and that he was of the opinion/opinion that he could have a certificate, and I then could not come to terms with that by virtue of the fact -- the doctor then agreed with me if he failed to take his medication or if he ran out of medication, or if any crisis happened in his life, what did I have to do then, so I then went to my police surgeon, and the police surgeon, while she did not examine the applicant, she was able to give me a diagnosis that the bipolar disease is a disease which you have for life, and she would not have recommended that someone get a firearm or a shotgun certificate, so on the basis of that, I refused these applications for certificates from this applicant, and it was again going to a Hearing, and on the day of the Hearing, his solicitor withdrew the application for appeal to the Sheriff at Cupar, and that was that one finished.

Is it common for you to want to get additional information from doctors? - I now regularly consult the police surgeon about additional information about mental illness or mental problems.

Are you entitled to go asking an individual applicant's doctor about his background? - Only with a mandate signed by the individual applicant.

And apart from the case you have just told us about, have you sought on other occasions mandates from applicants? - On the odd occasion over the last five years.

And have they always agreed? - No.

What I am concerned about, as you will appreciate, is to try to identify circumstances in which in your experience you may have had to act on the strength of material you couldn't substantiate for sure. Have you any experience of doing that? - I have experience of trying to do it, but for a variety of reasons, have been unable to do it.

Can you help us then with an example of that? - Well, I know only of the Hamilton case, the Dunblane case, which I have learned from colleagues and learned in the paper, so I have not a deep knowledge of it.

Lay/

Lay that aside and try and give us an example of the problems that you have faced trying to deal with unsubstantiated material which is to the detriment of the applicant or certificate holder? - This is a painful area for all senior police officers. When I get a file to me on the basis that you have just described, I always return it to the enquiry officer with a list of questions asking for further enquiry to be made, and it's not being awkward; it's just a case of trying to gain every aspect of criminal intelligence or anecdotal stories or anything that can help me to make a judgement, but on occasions, whilst I have been unhappy to grant or renew, I have had to grant and renew because my gut feeling has not been corroborated by other evidence which would have been of help to me to take the thing through revocation or refusal.

Say for example you had information from officers that someone was suspected of committing an offence with a firearm, but you had no hard and fast evidence of that, would that be enough for you to make a decision? - That's a situation where -
- was there corroborated evidence that he was suspected?

No? - Was he a person who made an allegation that the person pointed or presented a gun at him? Was he a credible witness? Was she a credible witness? I would have to go into all the aspects, for example.

For example, I must use the test of fairness and reasonableness, and I have to look at every aspect available to me before I make that determination. If evidence is uncorroborated it might be someone trying to make things difficult for the applicant at grant of renewal.

Does the prospect of having to face up to a reassessment or a consideration of the position by the Sheriff affect your judgment at all? - It does not affect my judgment, sir.

In what circumstances would you expect a Sheriff to interfere with a Deputy Chief Constable's decision about a Firearms Certificate? - Only if the Deputy Chief Constable or whoever signed the certificate has in the Sheriff's opinion acted in an unreasonable fashion. I personally have not had a decision overturned by a Sheriff.

Could I turn to something else? Access to homes of applicants when your officers are investigating applications: are they entitled just to turn up and demand entry? - No, not at this moment.

Would you like the officers to be in a position to do that? - That is one of the parts of the submission from our Association, that we would like our officers to be able to make spontaneous visits.

Now, I know that on occasion this happens. If the officer has made an appointment with the person's spouse or his girlfriend and that person has not handed on that information to the applicant the police officers or civilians in our Force can turn up at an unguarded moment and find things they are not happy with.

What advantages do you see from being able to insist on entry? - The advantages are that the applicant or the person who is having the visit is not in a position to have everything locked away, if he is careless and not professional in his management of his weaponry, ammunition, he can leave things lying about, he can leave things behind doors, he can leave things in a state of readiness instead of having his weapons properly locked away and safe.

At/

At the stage of carrying out such an investigation in relation to either an application to grant or to renew do your officers make contact with the clubs at which persons interested in pistol shooting actually do their shooting? - My officers do, yes.

Do they always make contact with the club? - Yes.

What is the purpose of that? - It is to check if the applicant for grant or renewal is in a position to be allowed access. Is he a probationary person at the club, has he finished his probation period, has he turned up regularly? Is he a regular shooter? Is he okay? Do they know him? I know that the records of these clubs are not as we wish, and part of our submission is to tighten and improve that. We have approved clubs and clubs that are not approved. Approved clubs can provide ammunition, and.....

What would be the advantage to the police if all clubs were approved? - At the moment we have a good idea, but we do not know the unapproved clubs. In relation to a person like Hamilton, if we tightened up rules and conventions for approved clubs a person like Hamilton if we still had unapproved clubs could go along to an unapproved club and gain access to the weapons legitimately held at the club and use them, and we would not know anything about it.

Is there not always someone associated with a club who is a Firearms Certificate holder who is responsible for the weapons? - Yes.

Are there any clubs in your area you do not know about? - That is the very question I was addressing to myself this morning. I don't know; there could be.

BY LORD CULLEN: You were asked some questions about the right of entry for police officers, and I think you were in favour of that? - Yes.

Would you apply the same comment to civilians? - Yes. Civilian police staff? I would.

At/

At the moment I have got the police officers with me. For example, if a man is alleged to have beaten up his wife and we know that officers going there have a knowledge that this person is a Firearms Certificate holder, if this person has committed a fairly serious crime we would want them to take possession of his weapons at the time.

Now, sometimes we take civilians along with police officers, and the police officers use their powers under the Police (Scotland) Act to take these weapons under their powers at common law to make sure this person cannot do any further harm to anyone in the house, and I instruct that these weapons should be taken possession of at this time. Recently I applied to a Sheriff for a warrant to take weapons.

You are in favour of some form of right being applied to civilians as well? - Yes.

That would require some new statutory powers? - Yes. Under the Police and Magistrates Court Act through this Firearms Consultative Body we made recommendations to the Scottish Office a few years ago.

Prior to the Police and Magistrates Court Act, if civilians found a weapon in one part of my Force area he had to get a police officer to convey that weapon to Police Headquarters.

That Act has now been changed to allow that civilian to convey these weapons. We would wish civilians to have the powers to take possession of weapons on entry.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY:

How do you envisage the improvement of records kept by clubs to help the police? - There are several areas I would like to see improvements in, and these are -- at the moment there is something like 10,300 handguns in Scotland, and if Parliament or Lord Cullen supports our recommendations that would come down to about 500 odds, we estimate, single-shot pistols. We don't see this as being a change overnight; it would be a change over a substantial period, to bring firearms clubs into line with our proposed new legislation.

We would say that single-shot weapons, people with multi-shot weapons would want to have a variety of other single-shot weapons, so the number of weapons would go up from 500, but it would certainly/certainly be substantially reduced from 10,300.

We feel that proper records would allow us to know how often a person with a Firearms Certificate shoots his weapon, how much ammunition he uses with that weapon, and I would want an accountancy position in the records, that the Secretary or someone with responsibility within the club would count ammunition, the same as we do in firearms training at the moment, where we count out the ammunition, and P.C. Bloggs gets 100 rounds for his training, and he has then to produce the shells from the weapon he has fired, and they are counted back in. We would want the same control on rifle clubs and pistol clubs.

In connection with appeal procedures, do you feel that the present powers to remove weapons pending a decision on appeal or revocation are adequate? - No, they are not adequate.

Why is that? - I would like Parliament through Lord Cullen to give us the power to remove these weapons, and to send a letter to the person I suspend -- I would like the power to remove these weapons at that stage from that house or that building.

The letter you wrote is to what effect? You are talking about revoking the certificate? - I am talking about suspending it, suspending the person from carrying out further hobby or sport with his weapon.

Does that happen at present? - I do that at present.

What happens to the weapons at that stage? - He is supposed to hand them over to a firearms dealer.

And if he fails to do that? - Usually they do. On an odd occasion I have had an assurance from a solicitor that the weapons would be safe and not be used until the next stage of the procedures took place. So I would like powers to take these weapons at that time.

Now, I would like to be clear about the area we are in. Is the course you would simply take not simply to revoke and require the holder of the/the certificate to hand in or surrender his weapon? - I revoke before the person goes to court on the charges he is alleged to have committed.

Do you have the power of suspension of the Firearms Certificate? - I suspend the Firearms Certificate until such time as he or she, the police officers, can finish their enquiries for a few days, then I assess the situation, and I then revoke.

Is that something you can only do with the co-operation of the individual applicant or certificate holder? - That is correct.

BY LORD CULLEN: You have no legal powers to suspend; is that right? - No. I don't want to revoke, however, until I have made sure that there is evidence for me to proceed with revocation.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMY: We have heard some evidence about this sort of procedure already; it is not unique to you. You are suggesting at the moment you would need the co-operation of the individual who satisfies you that his weapons are securely out of his reach pending your decision? - Yes.

We have heard it suggested that in at least one Force arrangements might be made for weapons to be handed in to a firearms dealer? - That is what I encourage the person involved to do.

Do you see there being some advantage in there being a power to suspend while you are finalising your enquiry? - Sometimes there is a fairly substantial period of time. We have one ongoing at the moment where another investigation team for example from another discipline called at a house in relation to another enquiry, and they were so concerned about what they found in that house regarding weaponry that they came along to me. I then sent a team of officers along.

I was in a great dilemma: "Do I take these weapons?". The person was depressed. "Do I leave them at home with him?". I gave my officers a letter to take these weapons until they sorted out what he legitimately had.

Now, we had a tremendous job sorting out which were real weapons, which were replicas, which was homemade ammunition, which was live ammunition and/and which was false ammunition.

What powers were you exercising in giving that letter for the purpose of removing these? - Under the Police (Scotland) Act, to prevent further public disorder or crime.

Now, Mr. Cameron suggested it is to you I should direct any questions I have about advertising applications. If a person applies for a Firearms Certificate and there remains the possibility that he can keep the firearm at home -- if we just assume that for the moment -- is there some risk in public advertisement of an application that it simply draws attention to the fact that that house has a gun in it? - The Police Federation, the Superintendents' Association and my Association had considerable difficulty with this in our debate. We discussed it for a long time. We came down and said "Yes, we must look at this, but in the risk of criminal activity, looking at the papers, particularly the local papers, to see who was making application, and the weaponry, the benefits of that might be outweighed by the disbenefits, and we recommended that should not happen.

So you were in favour of not recommending advertising? - Yes.

Would the position be different if guns were kept not at home but at clubs? - Absolutely.

I take it there is some benefit in informing the public so if anyone has an objection on the basis of character, for example, they would be able to state it? - If our recommendation was taken on board by Lord Cullen and Parliament that weapons should no longer be kept at home, it would be probably an advantage for people to have to advertise in certain circumstances, to tell the public, their neighbours, etc., that they were applying for the grant of a Firearms or a Shotgun Certificate. The main criterion we were considering was that we did not want criminals to be aware of where even under proper security weapons could be held.

There are a number of provisions in the 1968 Firearms Act which provide for the possession of firearms without holding a certificate: there are/are various exempt categories. If a person becomes a prohibited person because of a conviction is he also prohibited from possessing firearms under one of these exempt categories? - I am not quite sure what you are getting at.

You know there are various people such as auctioneers, slaughterers, theatre and cinema performers and also persons connected with ships and aircraft who may possess firearms without certificates? - Yes.

When a person is a prohibited person, cannot get a Firearms Certificate, can he hold a firearm under one of these other provisions, albeit he would be prohibited from having a Firearms Certificate? - I am sorry, I should know that, but I don't know.

Forgive me for asking the question. I thought it was contained in the joint report, but I may have misunderstood.

Do/

2.40 p.m.

Do you have the joint submission there? - Yes.

If you have 2.2.197, it is certainly touched on but it may be it is not put in the way I was inviting you to address it? - Page 49, 2.2.197?

Yes. In any event, we call all consider that for ourselves later. Thank you, Mr. Bennett? - Thank you.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. CAMPBELL: Just very briefly; you were asked certain questions by my learned friend, Mr. Bonomy, in the context of the kinds of circumstances which might prompt you to revoke a firearms licence or refuse to grant one. I don't want to deal with this in detail with you but rather talk about the general topic in the generality if I may. Witnesses have given evidence at this Inquiry to the general effect that in the absence of something hard and fast or in the absence of criminal convictions or in the absence of something which will stand up in a Court of law, that kind of thing, it is difficult to refuse an application for a firearms licence. Assuming that that kind of impression or view is held, can you help me with this; is there a general approach in police forces that an individual has a right to hold a firearm or to obtain a firearms licence, a right which must be rebutted by hard and fast evidence or however you want to put it? - Well, that is a long question but the fact of the matter is that I can't speak for what other Depute Chief Constables or Chief Constables do but in my Force area I don't feel a difficulty.....there are very difficult decisions to be made but I don't find a difficulty in worrying about an appeal, I don't find a difficulty in worrying about the cost of that appeal. I look at all the evidence that I can possibly get and possibly collate before I make a judgment but sometimes because of all the attendant circumstances, and just by virtue of the fact someone is a vexatious complainer about the police and different things, it doesn't allow me to have sufficient evidence in my mind and my own gut feeling to corroborate that to revoke or to refuse renewal or grant of a certificate.

Is/

Is that to an extent based upon a view that you have to have sufficient evidence which will in some way rebut a presumption that any individual is entitled to apply for and gain a firearms licence? - Yes. Well, if an individual meets certain criteria he is entitled to be granted that shotgun licence or firearms certificate and the two cases I went through with Lord Cullen and Mr. Bonomy did have sufficient grounds where I felt that I had a clear duty in my role as police officer in charge of Fife's firearms, a clear duty for the protection of public safety and the peace, to do what I did.

In your evidence you indicated, and I am sure we all understand this, that in considering these matters you had a duty to act fairly. Can I ask you this; fairly towards whom? - Yes, I have a duty to act reasonably fairly to the public out there, to my police officers and to the applicant.

Would you understand a view that if a senior police officer has a gut feeling that somebody is unsuited to have a firearm, weapon, in his lawful possession then it is unfair to the rest of the public who are at risk from this person that that should not be regarded as something to revoke his licence? - Well, I have got to say that on occasions I have gone against recommendations for refusal from officers under my command and the question is it is a test of reasonableness and a test of fairness.

Of course it is very difficult to talk about this in any other way other than the generality because would you agree that one man's unsubstantiated allegation is another man's clear evidence? - That is correct. Absolutely, yes.

So would you see any value in consideration being given in the course of any reform to making it clear, maybe if this was thought to be the correct approach, to making it clear that in considering whether to grant a firearms licence, in considering whether to revoke a firearms licence, when considering whether to renew a firearms licence, the only question is the suitability of the person and the other criteria and that that matter is not to be viewed in the context of any presumption in favour of the individual having the weapon? - Well, again I think that that is one way forward/forward but, you know, we would like to see it much simpler but I don't know if it is as simple as that.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. GIBB: Just one point that arises out of your earlier answers. You mentioned several times the question of corroboration. Is it your view that you do need some form of corroboration before you will find there is substance to information you have? - It is my view that it does not need to be a witness for corroboration. Corroboration, as you well know, can be derived from many aspects and facets but the fact is you can actually end up with a situation with credibility and you can actually end up with one to one, the applicant denying that he ever did a certain thing and yet an allegation being made by someone and I would look for some form of corroborative evidence to identify the fact that the person who is making the allegation could be believed. That is what I was meaning.

Let's assume someone makes an allegation and there is no conceivable source of corroboration of any sort but you are satisfied that the person giving you that information is giving you truthful information. Are you not entitled to rely on that without insisting on any actual corroboration in law? - Yes, if what you are saying is correct, that the person is a completely reliable person and can give very good evidence to the effect that he or she saw a specific incident, I would have to take strong cognisance and consideration of that.

We have heard a lot of evidence in this Inquiry about some need for corroboration but I think you would accept corroboration in fact is itself a red herring? - No, it not a red herring. If, and I use anecdotal hypothesis, if I received evidence that one person was everything you are saying, was entirely credible and this, that and next thing, that would not necessarily allow me to believe that I had to believe that person's side. I have to consider the other person's side. I have to try and draw a distinction. Is there disharmony or acrimony here between the two? What caused this person to come forward with this? I don't think it is a red herring. I think in terms of fairness I still require to look at all the aspects.

You talked about the question of....

you were properly asked by Mr. Campbell about the question of fairness? - Yes.

If in fact you have an applicant who categorically denies something happened and you have from one source and one source only, one credible and reliable source, that something did happen which the applicant denies, are you entitled in your view to accept that uncorroborated evidence and for instance refuse certificate renewal or revoke the certificate or do you take the view in that event where there is a clear one to one that the presumption must be in favour of the applicant? - Well, with that very bold statement there I find myself in a dilemma but I would look at the previous papers pertaining to that file and having regard to all the circumstances the probability is that I would probably have to come down on renewing the certificate in favour of the applicant.

I can't help feeling there is confusion in the evidence we have heard about the question of substantiation of evidence as opposed to corroboration and there has been often the suggestion that without corroboration of something then there was no substantiation which would justify revocation or refusal to renew? - Well, my personal view is that I take a fairly strong line with grants, refusals and revocations. I have a consistent approach and a strong line. In the narrative you have indicated to me about one against one, I would have to be very careful. In fairness to the applicant I would have to be very careful that I did not err.

So even if your gut feeling was against the applicant, you would probably feel you had to grant? - Well, I have had a few gut feelings in five to seven years and I have had to grant them, yes.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. TAYLOR: When somebody makes application for a firearms certificate, what do you find in the most common reason he gives for wanting to have such a certificate? - Gamekeepers and farmers which cause me less problems than others.

I am sorry, it was a badly framed question. I mean the firearms certificate to enable/enable him to be in possession of handguns? - I beg your pardon.

Mainly target shooting. If someone applies for any other reason I don't normally grant it.

And where does the applicant normally carry out his target shooting? - Approved ranges.

And upon the application being made, what steps does your force take to ascertain if the applicant is a member of a Club? - Well, we normally call on the Club. I would say on all occasions I would demand that they call on the Club and see if this person has joined the Club, if he is coming up to the criteria the Club set, is he doing a probationary period and follow it up from there.

And when that person's application comes up for renewal and if he is able to furnish you with a membership card say and a phone call to the Secretary of the Club confirms that membership has been maintained, do you need to take any further steps? - Well, it is more than just a phone call. The phone call ask and elicits several questions. Is he a regular attender? Is he a good shot? Is he complying with the disciplines in the Club? Is he trying to better himself or is he just going through the motions? We can get a lot of intelligence back from that.

Is this something which has recently been introduced into your force following the events of the 13th March? - No.

When enquiry is made at the Club do you ascertain what guns he is using at any time? - Well, no, this is a problem again because sometimes I have had to issue firearms certificates for people for three guns for one discipline and that does not rest easy with me but sometimes they make arguments that you may have a gun for 25 metres, you may have a gun for 50 metres and the sights are zeroed in for that discipline and they need a gun for a spare gun and as you will see I think from the Home Office, Scottish Office, evidence that sometimes they make arguments that one person could have up to seven guns for one discipline. Now, I have these people in my force area and I am not particularly happy with that but when I phone or my staff phone the Clubs, the Club can't tell us what guns are being used/used at the moment but I think we should have a register that tells us that guns A, B and C have been used regularly and gun D has not.

What test do you consider the guidelines give to police forces as to what will constitute good reason to have a firearms certificate? - The test is I have got to look at.....

Would it help you to have the Guidance before you? - Yes.

It is document D1 in Volume L? - Is the person unfit.....

I hope my question was restricted only to good reason and not to any of the other criteria which are set out? - Does he meet the good reason?

We will assume the Chief Officer of police is satisfied he is safe to have a weapon without being a danger to public safety and the peace and he is not of intemperate habits and he is not of unsound mind and he is otherwise fit to be entrusted with firearms so he meets these criteria. What do you consider the test to be to satisfy the one remaining criterion which is that of good reason? - I haven't found it here but the test that I can.....

If you look at Page 69 you might find some help. It should be Paragraph 6.8(e)? - Yes, regular and legitimate opportunity to use that weapon is the test that I adhere to and is in the Home Office Guidelines. Is that the point you are making?

Yes, so your interpretation is that it is regular and legitimate opportunity to use the weapons which are set out in the firearms certificate? - Yes. What I am not happy about is sometimes the number of weapons that these shooters say they require to carry out legitimate and regular opportunity. I think that they don't need so many weapons as they do but I am bound by the law to meet the application if they meet all the other criteria.

If the test is whether or not an applicant or a holder seeking renewal has regular and legitimate opportunity, why does it become necessary/necessary to carry out a check as to whether he has been regularly shooting? - Because up until now people in Clubs, people who are responsible in Clubs, have not been phoning the police and telling us they have persons who visit their Club or a specific person has not been attending regularly or has not been shooting regularly and I think it would be a benefit to us if the responsible people in such approved Clubs were made to come back to us and say that such and such a person has been acting different lately, such and such a person has not been here for some time and in fact we have told a certain person not to come back. We don't have control of these things at the moment.

There are two things in there though, aren't there?
There is whether or not the person has been shooting responsibly on the range and you would perhaps want to know about that in order that you could satisfy yourself that he is fit to be entrusted with a firearm. Is that an understanding? - Yes.

But if I have understood your evidence correctly, you also make enquiry to ascertain if he is making use of the Club?
- Yes, we do.

And I was wondering why you seek to identify use given that all that one needs, looking at the Guidance, is to have a regular opportunity, a regular chance.

LORD CULLEN: I am not sure he quite says that is all that is required?

MR. TAYLOR: I will take out the "all".

LORD CULLEN: I think it is quite important we establish with the witness whether that is the exclusive test or whether it is something in the test.

MR. TAYLOR: I take your point.

CROSS/

CROSS-EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR.

TAYLOR: You heard the exchange with Lord Cullen. Can you say what you consider to be the test or tests which would apply when considering whether somebody has met the "good reason" criterion? - The officers who are carrying out the enquiry on my behalf, my briefing to them is, are they legitimately using this club on a regular basis to go and carry out the discipline of target shooting. If the person joins and then does not pay any attention to his shooting in the future, that causes me concern. If the person develops into a Clint Eastwood type character I would wish to know that.

We have these people who want as a big a gun as possible, to shoot as big a target as possible -- preferably moving -- and to make as big a bang as possible. These are the tension indicators I wish brought back to my enquiry officers.

People can go for years to these clubs, and at the moment if we don't make contact with the club we get no intelligence back as to how they present, when they are performing in the target area.

I can understand how you would want to identify a Clint Eastwood character. If someone was applying for renewal and it was established that over the five year period they had not made use of the facilities of the club for four years and nine months, but during the preceding three months they had shot quite frequently, by which I mean once a week, what would you do in such circumstances? - That particular circumstances has not arisen to my knowledge, but what has arisen is that I have found out that people have not been shooting for a while, and I have caused enquiry to be made to see, and confirmed that on some occasions they have been working away from home, they have been working abroad, or it has not been possible for that person to undertake their chosen sport in Fife. I have satisfied myself that they still complied with the terms and spirit of the Act.

For example, if a man works on the oil rigs the period of time can be sporadic. It can be three months he is there, three months he is not there, and we have to take that into consideration.

If/

If over a five year period someone had indicated to you when making application for renewal that they had not shot during the period of their certificate just expired, but they still intended to shoot in the future and wished to retain the opportunity so to do, what would your position be in those circumstances? - Again that is a very difficult question. In my opinion, if he met all the criteria and was giving an assurance he was going to be shooting in the future it would be very difficult to turn him down.

If at the conclusion of the second period of the certificate he indicates to you he is terribly sorry, but he has been unable to shoot for the preceding three years once more, and the reason was pressure of work, domestic circumstances, etc., and he says "But I still intend to take up that opportunity", what then are you able to do if anything? - That is one of our recommendations, that we want that set of circumstances to come in.

What can you do at the present moment? - Not enough.

Can you do anything? - No.

Would you feel obliged in such circumstances to grant the application? - Yes, unless I could get my staff to talk him out of it.

Assuming he stands by his gun, so to speak, and is not to be talked out of it? - I would try and use negotiation to persuade people that they do not require these weapons. That is why we discussed it in our group. We have a problem.

If someone has several weapons of a different calibre what duties does the law impose upon any police officer when an application is made to renew a certificate in respect of these several weapons?

LORD CULLEN: Mr. Taylor, we can look at the law for ourselves. What is the point in asking this of this witness?

MR. TAYLOR: Well, sir, sometimes it helps if one knows how the law is being interpreted.

LORD/

LORD CULLEN: That is not quite what you were asking the witness.

MR. TAYLOR: In that case I will rephrase the question.

LORD CULLEN: If you think it is going to assist me.

MR. TAYLOR: I will bear that in mind, my lord.

CROSS-EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR.

TAYLOR: If an applicant has several weapons on his certificate and he makes application for renewal of that certificate what do you have to satisfy yourself in respect of when you come to consider that application? - I have just renewed one at the moment, which did not give me great pleasure, where the person had permission to possess something like eight or nine weapons, pistols, and I put it back without signing it to have further enquiry made in order that we could satisfy ourselves that the man had a requirement.

There were only three different types of calibres of weapon, and a comprehensive enquiry was carried out and an interview with the applicant was again undertaken by the officers -- this all happened pre-the 13th March -- and the person ended up satisfying me he did require all these weapons to undertake all the various disciplines he worked with.

This is a very, very important issue. I personally am not a shooter, and I do not understand why people need that number of weapons, but I had to grant it.

Could you look at page 70, 6.8(i)? We see in the second paragraph that the Home Office requests that "good reason" requirements will need to be satisfactorily demonstrated in respect of each firearm; is that right? - Yes. If someone wants to shoot at 25 metres and 50 metres and he doesn't want to zero in each weapon and he then wants a spare weapon in case he is shooting in a competition and one jams or breaks then that is three weapons already.

And in your view that would be him satisfying the "good reason" test under the present guidance?/

guidance? - Exactly, yes.

RE-EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMOY: Can you clear up the rather confused question I put to you at the end of my initial examination? Could you look at paragraph 2.2.95, which is on page 28 of your submissions? Now, I asked you a confusing question I think in my examination about prohibited persons. Could you read please paragraph 2.2.95? - "Neither can we accept the notion that individuals who have been deemed unsuitable either by way of refusal or revocation or, indeed, where their certificate has been cancelled by a Court, can thereafter quite lawfully possess firearms by way of any of the exemptions provided in the Firearms Acts", and I subscribe to that.

Is that a paragraph dealing with the problem that certain people who do not hold a firearm certificate may nevertheless be entitled to possess a firearm in an exemption category? - Yes.

That may or may not apply to prohibited persons, but I think that where a person does not have a firearm certificate they may well be able to possess a firearm under that exemption? - Yes.

TERENCE McCARTHEY (55) Affirmed

EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMOY: I live in Argyll. I work as a Local Government Officer.

I think you are also an office bearer of the Scottish Pistol Association? - Yes.

What office do you hold? - I am the Honorary Secretary.

I think you have held a number of positions on your own local rifle and pistol club? - Yes.

Over what period of time have you been on the committee of that club? - Since 1980, as far as I remember.

What is your present position there? - I am the President of the club.

I/

I think apart from now being Secretary of the Scottish Pistol Association you have held a number of other positions on its Executive? - Correct.

You are also a particularly expert marksman; is that right? - I am a reasonably accomplished marksman, yes.

I think you held a position of coach with the Scottish National Rifle Team in Canada in 1994? - Yes.

Coach to what? - The pistol section of the team.

And the team consisted of which sections? - There were two pistol shooters out of a total team of 14.

What were the other 12? - There were four shotgunners, two full bore rifles and the remainder were small bore rifles.

Now, does a coach of pistol shooting require any qualifications? - One can coach without a specific qualification, but there are qualifications that you can take as a coach.

Do you hold a qualification? - I am an SP-qualified primary coach, which is a basic level coach in terms of qualifications.

I think you are also a qualified range conducting officer? - Yes.

Now, we have heard some reference to that earlier on in the Inquiry already. How is that qualification obtained? - One has to take a course run and organised by the National Rifle Association.

What is the purpose of the qualification? - To train people to operate, specifically at Ministry of Defence and Territorial Army ranges, as the person in overall command of the range. Their prime responsibility is to run the range safely and efficiently, in line with military requirements.

Is that different from being the range officer, who actually supervises the discipline as the/

the shooting is taking place? - Yes. The range conducting officer may still have a subordinate range officer working under him.

Does that mean that you as the range conducting officer for a particular range, or is it only a position you actually hold when you are out shooting on a particular occasion as a range conducting officer? - It varies. You can operate on any range throughout the country.

So that when there is shooting taking place you can be in charge of the range? - Yes.

Is that something you do regularly? - I certainly do it regularly in club terms. I have not done a large amount of range conducting on military ranges.

Are you a competitive shooter yourself? - Yes.

At any particular level that we might recognise? - I have shot for Scotland in one discipline.

So my earlier description was accurate? - It was some little while ago.

When was that? - That would have been I think about seven years ago.

Now, do you shoot a number of disciplines? - Yes.

How long altogether have you been shooting? - I started shooting in 1974.

What are the disciplines you have shot? What are the periods since 1974? - Basic club precision pistol, I have shot at most of the International Shooting Union events, I have shot police pistol, service pistol, classics and clay pigeon target.

What was the body you mentioned? - UIT, the International Shooting Union.

What does that stand for? - It is French: Union Internationale de Tir.

What/

What is the status of that body? - It is the world governing body for a substantial group of disciplines which are shot up to an automatic level.

Do you been at World Championships? - World Championships, World Cup, European Championships. All competitions under international rules are shot to UIT rules.

Are they the only body in whose jurisdiction competitions are shot? - No.

What other bodies are there? - There are a variety of national and international bodies.

In the UK? - In the UK there would be the National Rifle Association, the National Small Bore Rifle Association, the National Pistol Association, the Historic Breech Loading Small Arms Association, the Muzzle Loaders Association of Great Britain, and others.

Are a number of these bodies based at Bisley? - A lot of the shooting will be done at Bisley, the NRA and the NSRA headquarters being both at Bisley.

Does the UIT govern both small bore and full bore? - Yes.

Do their rules require that the weapons conform to particular standards? - Yes.

How are these standards determined? - Depending on the discipline involved. They will specify whether they are single or multi-shot, the calibres which will be used, the physical size of the gun, the minimum trigger pull weight and minimum and maximum sight radius and so on.

In determining the size of the gun is there a particular method used? - Yes, there is a box provided into which the gun must fit.

3.20 p.m.

Do any of the competitions run under their rules involve shooting at targets which have human shape? - No.

In whose jurisdiction do we find competitions of that type? - The only competitions which use human shaped targets would be Police Pistol, Service Pistol and some forms of action shooting.

What is the origin of these? - The Police and Service Pistol, they are based on former and existing police and military trained courses of fire.

When did they first develop? - That I couldn't really say. They've certainly been in existence since well before I took up shooting.

Now, do you presently engage in any of these types of shooting yourself? - Currently, no.

Is there any particular reason why you don't do it now?
- My main interest has been International Shooting Union competitions and I gave up Police and Service Pistol mainly because I felt that I couldn't devote sufficient time to the wide range of disciplines and achieve the levels of expertise that I aspire to.

In your 19 years or so in I think club shooting as you describe it in your submission have you been aware of a growth in interest in competitions involving shooting at human shaped targets? - There has certainly been an increase in target pistol shooting overall. I think it would be fair to say that there is a strong participation in particularly Police Pistol which is a very popular discipline and shot by large numbers of people in competition.

Can you outline what that involves for us? - The Police Pistol discipline is a course of fire of 30 shots, the first 12 shots fired at 25 metres from the target in a time span of two minutes. The shooters then advance to 15 metres from the target in order to fire two series of six shots. Each series consists of one shot on each exposure of the target and there are six exposures. They then advance/advance to 10 metres from the target where they fire a series of six shots where two shots are fired on each exposure of a target.

And that completes the series? - That completes the series.

And is it always that series of shooting or can it vary?
- In Police Pistol 1, which is the most popular one, that is the series. There is also a discipline called Police Pistol 2 with which I am not so familiar which is shot at I think 50 metres and then shorter distances.

Now, you are or the body of which you are Secretary is a party to one of the submissions to Lord Cullen's Inquiry which is No. 51 submitted by the Scottish Target Shooting Federation? - That is correct.

And attached to that is a list of the types of competition? - Yes.

Now, it would be helpful if you could perhaps have that in front of you. If you have got your own copy that will do fine? - Yes.

Now, if you could perhaps go to Group E listing the police and service type competitions on page 23. We see there a reference to Police Pistol 1 and Police Pistol 2? - Yes.

And there are other disciplines there. Police Pistol 1 indicates that it can be done using any semi-automatic pistol or revolver? - Yes.

Whereas Police Pistol 2 is confined to revolvers, is that right? - Yes.

Is that just one example of the sort of information that is in this list attached to the submission? - Yes, that is correct.

And I think in addition the type of ammunition to be used is specified, the target and then the procedure that you have just given us? - Yes.

And then there are some comments and explanations which should assist the Inquiry, is that right? - Yes.

And/

And I think that you have provided that in relation to a whole series of different types of competition? - Yes.

Now, do we have here an exhaustive list of the types of competition that there are? - There may be one or two others but they will be of fairly minority interest.

In your period as an active competitive shooter has the number of different competitions increased? - Yes.

Significantly? - The number of competitions.....

I mean the types of discipline? - I would think certainly over the last 20 years there have been developments in what are loosely called action pistol shooting, Groups E and F in that submission.

Yes, the two end ones we have here? - Yes.

And that includes the Police Pistol you have just described to us? - Yes.

Is that the most popular of these? - Certainly in terms of numbers of competitors I would say Police Pistol 1 is one of the most popular disciplines in competitive shooting.

Of any calibre? - I think just in terms of overall numbers of competitor.

That is full bore competition, is it? - Yes.

Now, Group F lists or at least has one in it which is called Practical Pistol? - Yes.

Now, can you describe to us the nature of that competition? - The Practical Pistol form of competition is not a set series or a set format. It is a format designed to tax the ability of the shooter to shoot at different distances with either hand under time and various different types of target constraints.

Does/

Does he move to a different position? - In some parts of it, yes. In others they fire from a fixed position. That is why I say it is really a range of competitions which come loosely under the heading of Practical Pistol and courses of fire can be developed for specific competitions and specific ranges.

BY LORD CULLEN: Can you tell me what the IPSC target is? - That is the International Practical Shooting Federation.

What in fact does the target look like? What kind is it?
- IPSC target is a double rectangle of plain cardboard. A large rectangle with a small rectangle on top of it.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY: If human shaped targets disappeared from the scene, would that have a significant effect on competitive shooting? - I see no reason why it should. I understand that one or two of the European countries have prohibited shooting at humanoid targets. They shoot some competitions using a rectangular target with a disruptive pattern on it. If that were introduced here I would see no reason why that should present a problem to competitors.

If the calibre of guns or the range of calibre of guns was restricted to small bore, .22, would that have a significant effect on competitive shooting? - It would certainly mean that the rules of competition would have to be changed to cater for it and it would also mean those shooters who do aspire to international level shooting in the various disciplines would be prohibited from doing so.

BY LORD CULLEN: Is that answer on the basis it was semi-automatics but that would be restricted to .22? - Yes.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY: That heralds the next question; if guns are restricted to single shot, would that have a significant effect on competitive shooting in this country? - It would effectively reduce the target pistol shooting to almost zero. There are only two or three competitions which can be shot with a single-shot firearm.

And/

And we see them in the schedules at the end of the submission? - Yes. Single-shot firearms would be the UIT Free Pistol and the UIT Air Pistol. A couple of branches of long range pistol and then domestic slow fire position competition run under the NSRA rules.

I perhaps should have asked you a little more in relation to your experience as coach of the Commonwealth Games Team. Has Scotland always produced a shooting team in the Commonwealth Games? - Yes.

Has the Scottish team realised any success in the Commonwealth Games? - Scotland has always won medals at shooting at any Games I can remember. In Canada they came away with a total of seven out of the 22 medals that were won by the overall Scottish team. They provided nearly a third of the medals.

Sorry, nearly a third of all the medals, did you say? - All the medals that were won by the overall Scottish team.

Now, in these Commonwealth Games what disciplines are shot by pistol or at least by handgun? - For handgun there will be four. There is the UIT Centre Fire which is a full bore semi-automatic course. There is the Free Pistol which is the single-shot .22 air pistol and UIT Rapid Fire which is .22 semi-automatic course fire.

So only one of these is full bore? - Yes.

Do you know whether in the Olympic Games there are full bore competitions? - The Olympic Games does not include full bore competition.

Can I take it that other world competitions, World Championships, under UIT rules do include full bore shooting? - Yes.

Are there European Championships under these rules? - Yes.

Including full bore competition? - Yes.

Are there British Championships? - Yes.

And/

And do they include full bore competition? - Yes.

Can I ask you then now about shooting clubs, particularly in Scotland where you have experience. There has been a suggestion made to the Inquiry that it would be better certainly from a policing point of view if all clubs were approved which is not the case at present? - That is correct.

Do you see any particular problem or difficulty about requiring all clubs to be approved? - I see no particular problem, no.

If it is suggested that far better records than are kept overall at present should be kept so that the use of guns could be more closely monitored and the extent to which people use them to be more closely monitored, would you agree that clubs would effectively have to be approved for that purpose? - I think that would depend on exactly what sort of records are suggested. Most clubs will have records of members' attendances. Those clubs which are not Home Office approved can only have members who have their own individual Firearms Certificates anyway. It is difficult to say exactly. One would have to come up with a specific idea of what records you would want to keep to comment.

Yes, effectively you are saying people who are not experienced at shooting and who want to take it up have to go to an approved club to begin? - Yes.

And it is only people who have Firearms Certificates who can go to one which is not approved? - That is correct.

But if you are going to have records kept of the use of weapons, the extent to which they are used, the amount of ammunition being used, particularly where there is self-loading or acquisition at the club, then there would have to be some recognition of the club in the first instance to start that exercise off? - I am trying to think of a way to comment on that.

Well, you see, we have heard some evidence.....? - If the club has its records and/and if they need to be examined by whatever authority wishes to examine them, I don't see that they would need to be approved clubs.

We have heard some evidence to suggest that perhaps clubs may exist without the authorities knowing they are there at all. Do you accept that? - I would think that would be extremely difficult in that to all practical purposes, to have a Firearms Certificate for a handgun you have to demonstrate to the police good reason and the only normally acceptable reason is target shooting. When a grant or a renewal of a certificate is done the police will ask what club you are a member of and you have to tell them. It is difficult to see how a club could exist totally without the authority's knowledge.

Does approval by the Home Office of a club involve setting any standards for safety? - There is no specific criteria laid down on safety. The criteria for approval is that you have to have access to appropriate ranges and you have to have facilities for safe storage of the club firearms as against the individual members' firearms for which they are individually responsible.

3.40 p.m.

You have got to satisfy the Home Office for that approval that you can secure the weapons? - Yes.

You would have to be confining your activities to Home Office-approved ranges, I take it? - No, not to Home Office-approved ranges: to ranges with an appropriate safety certificate.

From whom? - The Ministry of Defence.

Do all rifle and pistol clubs belong to umbrella organisations? - Maybe not all, but certainly the vast majority, because by joining one of the umbrella organisations they have access to proper public liability and contents insurance.

For instance, your own home club will no doubt be a member of the Scottish Pistol Shooting Association; is that right? - Yes.

Is it also a member of any other Association? - We are affiliated to the National Rifle Association, the National Small Bore Rifle Association and the National Pistol Shooting Association.

Is it a common feature of clubs in Scotland to have so many affiliations? - Depending on the firearms used. Small bore rifle clubs would only normally be affiliated to the NSRA: those who shoot pistols would be affiliated to at least one if not two or three of these organisations.

When a person wants to take up the sport and has approached the club can he simply come in on his own and state his case and hope to be accepted? - No. Under the current criteria they are supposed to find out where the club is or find the name of the secretary and approach the secretary, who will talk to them, and they would then have to have a direct invitation to visit the club for the first time. On that first visit they would be shown what the club does, and would be given a lecture on the safety and range procedures. On that first visit they would not be allowed to handle guns or ammunition.

Where/

Where are these criteria set down? - There is a Home Office leaflet on the criteria for approval of gun clubs.

Does that deal with how you accept members? - Yes.

After we have got to the stage of the first visit what happens? - On the second and subsequent visits -- we are talking about a novice shooter -- they will then be given basic shooting training, either one-to-one supervision from a qualified coach or a suitably experienced full member of the club.

Then what happens? - During the time they are on probation.

They are members right from the start, but not probationary members; is that right? - They are called probationary members. That probation can be either extended or terminated at any time, if the club considers they are unsafe or for any reason unacceptable in their premises.

Can you envisage a situation in a properly-run club where a probationary member could actually be the range officer one night when activities are taking place? - No.

In general, how long is the probationary period? - The probationary period has been specified by the Home Office criteria. Before the 1988 Act there was no specified period: from the 1988 Act it specified six months; and last year in the recommendations of the Firearms Consultative Committee the probationary period was reduced to three months: so the minimum period would be three months.

Is that the standard all clubs apply, as far as you know? - If they are Home Office-approved clubs they would have to apply that as a minimum.

Do clubs apply a longer period? - In practical experience one finds that if you have to extend the probationary period beyond three months it is unlikely that the person involved will be an acceptable club member.

BY/

BY LORD CULLEN: At what stage do the police become aware of a person's application for membership? - Only if that person applies for their own firearms certificate.

Could that person defer that application until quite a late stage? - Yes, it is possible for somebody to be a club member indefinitely, and use club premises, if they do not wish to purchase their own gun.

Could a person approach a club with a view to membership and go along to the various stages without actually becoming a member? - Yes.

In your own experience as a committee member what interests do the police generally take in the activities of individual club members when they are dealing with renewal of the firearms certificate of that member? - Generally the only contact the club has would be a call from an officer to confirm that the person is a bona fide member of the club.

Is no interest taken in how much shooting he has been doing? - Certainly there has not been, in my experience in the past.

And you have dealt with such calls? - I have not. I have never been the secretary of my club. It is the secretary who deals with them regularly.

You know that is the position from the secretary? - Yes.

Do you find clubs insisting on proposers and seconders for new members? - Yes.

Well, insisting, or is it possible to be accepted without being vouched by others? - The general practice is certainly to have either a proposer or a referee named on the application form.

Does that mean a person who is a member of the club proposing the new member? - Yes.

What would happen if you didn't know anybody in the club? - What would happen is that if they are a novice, a probationer, they don't have full/full membership until they have completed their probationary period, and the referee, or seconder, by that time they would know -- whoever made the reference would have got to know the shooter.

That is at the stage of full membership? - Yes.

We have had evidence in the Inquiry of someone remaining a probationary member for ages. He would not have to be proposed or seconded? - I think for someone to remain a probationary member for more than three to six months would be exceptional.

A number of questions have been posed to you about the need to have more than one weapon of the same calibre. Can you indicate to us the circumstances in which a person like yourself might require to have more than one weapon of the same calibre? - Yes. Of the five UTI disciplines which I actually shoot, three of which are .22 calibre, it will need two different guns to be able to comply with the rules.

Can you explain that even in relation to one of them?
- If I shoot UTI procedure on a .22 single shot pistol, if I shoot standard pistol or sport pistol I need a .22 five shot semi-automatic. That is different guns of the same calibre.

All right? - In addition to that, if you are shooting competitively one would often need -- I mean regularly competitively -- one would need a spare or a back-up gun in the event of breakage of a gun in competition, which is allowed under the rules.

When you go to a competition away from your home club do you take spare weapons with you? - Those who have them, yes.

Is it common -- how common is it to have a spare? - I would say a spare weapon would be reasonably common in the upper levels of serious competitive shooting. At the middling to lower levels, not necessarily.

So if we narrow this down to more than one weapon of the same calibre for the same type of competition, / competition, the same discipline, apart from having one spare is there any good reason for having more than one such weapon? - If we are talking about a single discipline, no.

To give you a more specific example of that, if a person shoots generally speaking police pistol and uses a Browning semi-automatic pistol and has two of them, and one has a longer barrel, has a barrel weight and has a much lighter trigger because of certain adaptations done to it, and the other one is a standard model, is there any good reason for him having more? - If we are talking just specifically for police pistol, maybe not. But at the same time, by having another gun he would then be able to shoot other disciplines with it.

Which/

Which one would give him an additional facility? - Depending on which classification within the discipline he was doing. For instance, within Service Pistol there are three or four classifications that cater for different types of gun. It depends how enthusiastic the person is to shoot different classes. One could not give a definite yes or no answer to that.

Treating it as a hypothetical question, give me an example of the different uses to which these weapons might have been put within the range of disciplines you are talking about? - It would be more common to find a 9 mm Browning being used in Service Pistol.

Now, there are four classifications, and the basic classification is the competitions shot with a 9 mm Browning as issued to the British Army, therefore he will not be able to use the extended barrel and the barrel weighted gun in that class, while he would be able to use it in another class, which allows for it, and in which he may be able to produce better scores for that gun.

One suggestion that has been presented to the Inquiry is that weapons might not need to be kept at home but could be kept at the Club. Would that present any problems to a serious competitive shooter? - It would present problems not only to a serious competitive shooter but to a middle ranking shooter as well.

Why would that be? - It is common practice to travel to open competitions often quite great distances from your home range. A lot of competitions are held at Bisley in Surrey, both pistol and rifle.

Competitive shooters will travel there up to half a dozen times a year. They will also shoot in Scotland on many other ranges.

Once one had completed shooting, what does one do with the gun? Does it have to go back to the Club immediately? There are a lot of practical difficulties which make it onerous for the serious competitive shooter.

It would be possible I suppose to check the/

the gun out and check it back in, and there might be regulations to govern that allowing some leeway for collecting it and travelling with it and bringing it back. Could there be other problems resulting from not being able to keep your gun at home? - I think one of the problems is that you are then collecting large numbers of guns in specific locations.

Now, shooting ranges by their nature are often away from normal public access, to reduce any noise problems. In my own Club, for instance, if everybody had to keep their guns at the Club we would have well in excess of 300 guns, which I think presents a serious problem in terms of the fact that it would be a very attractive target for criminal elements and/or terrorist elements.

In relation to the training and practice you have to do as a marksman would there be any problems presented there if you could not take your gun home? - At a very basic level, no. Once one becomes reasonably proficient there are lots of difficulties.

One of the advantages of having the gun off the range is to carry out dry firing, to practice your aim and trigger pull without the release of a projectile with an unloaded gun. This is a practice carried out by every top class competitive shooter, and many problems would be.....I suppose you could still go to the Club and do it? - If you go to the Club you would be firing live ammunition if you are on the range. The whole point of dry firing is that you can practice away from the range.

Is that something you would do regularly if you were a serious competitor? - Yes.

BY LORD CULLEN: Is this once a day, once a week or what? - I would think certainly two or three times a week would be quite normal. The really top class people do it every day.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY:
Can you tell me the nature of the Club premises at your own Club?
- Our Club is a 25 metre pistol and rifle range. The actual firing range is a block-built building. The Club House dated back from the inception of the Club 50 years ago, and is basically a/a timber Home Guard hut. Bearsden's original name was the Bearsden District Home Guard Rifle Club.

Is it also a social club? - No. We provide such things as access to soft drinks, coffee and biscuits, but that is about the only social aspect to it.

Is that a fairly standard situation, or do Clubs vary greatly in the facilities they provide? - There is quite a wide range of Club facilities. Most Clubs will consist of a range plus a Club room: some may have a separate room to be used as an armoury for Club firearms; some will just have a large stout safe in the corner of the Club room. As a generality, a range plus a Club House would be typical.

In/

4 p.m.

In a clubhouse of the type you have described? -
Some will be. The more modern ones will be brick or block built. I have seen them being made of corrugated iron.

BY LORD CULLEN: How many handguns does the club hold for the use of members? - My own club has nine.

And I take it supplies of ammunition as well? - Yes.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY: I see in your statement you do mention at paragraph 3.6 that there has been an increase in pistol shooting over the period you have been shooting. You describe it as a significant increase? - Yes.

In target pistol shooting and you also say a large proportion of the increase has been in the popular police pistol discipline, service pistol and various forms of action pistol? - Yes.

So is it fair to say in the last 20 years just in general terms there has been a significant increase in these disciplines? -
Yes.

Can I ask you a little about ammunition. One other possibility might be the storage of ammunition only in club premises.
What particular problems would that pose for competitive shooters?
- I think exactly the same problem as if the guns were stored there.

Well, that is a security problem. Let's leave security to one side? - No, also for travelling. Storing ammunition there presents exactly the same problems to a shooter as if the guns were stored there.

Now, there are different ways of dealing with ammunition depending on whether it is small bore or full bore? -
Yes.

In relation to small bore ammunition, that is all commercially produced, is that right? - Yes.

Nevertheless, /

Nevertheless, do competitive shooters experiment and work with small bore ammunition to find something that gives them that bit extra in competition? - It is quite common to try different brands of ammunition and within a given brand to try different types. The common brand in Britain is manufactured by Elio and they make about 12 different sorts of .22 ammunition, some of which is tailored to rifle, some of which is tailored to pistol. It is common to experiment with the various types and brands to see which one gives the best inherent accuracy for the particular gun that you are using.

But that would be done at the club? - Oh, yes.

And ammunition at the club would be no problem in that regard. Turning to full bore, people can actually reconstitute their own ammunition? - Yes.

Is that done at the club or at home? - Normally at home.

It could be done at the club, is that right? - It could be done at the club but for safety reasons you would normally expect it to be done in a special and separate room.

How important is home loading to the competitive shooter? - Very important. We have heard that something in the region of 70 per cent of full bore pistol shooters will produce their own ammunition. I can't vouch for the accuracy of that figure but it is certainly a very high percentage. It has two advantages, one that you can tailor the ammunition to the specific firearm to get the best inherent accuracy and it also has the advantage of being more economic than buying factory ammunition of good quality but unknown consistency.

So the person who is very serious about his full bore shooting will generally make his own? - Yes.

After experimenting with different mixes I suppose? - Yes.

And will know what best suits his weapon?/

weapon? - Yes.

But if pushed that could be done at the club? - It could be done at the club at extreme inconvenience to the serious target shooter and would also produce the potential for safety problems at the club. One of the advantages of doing it at home is that you can concentrate exactly on what you are doing without any exterior distraction from possibly other club members if you are at the club.

BY LORD CULLEN: Can I just ask about one matter. I see that you mention in your statement a problem where you have prospective members and there is a possibility that they are prohibited? - Yes.

Have you any suggestion as to how that problem might be solved? - The only way I can think of is if there was some method by which the club secretary could check the written declaration that the person is not prohibited with the police, which currently they are not permitted to do.

Would one way of dealing with this be to have a system under which all prospective members names required to be reported to the police at the outset? - That could be done but I think you would have to ask I think the police as to the effectiveness of that, as to what information they are permitted to give out.

Yes, I wasn't thinking about that. I was thinking that to get round the difficulty of you being required to make enquiries of the police, if as a matter of course you reported the name to the police then that might enable the police to take appropriate action? - That could be done, yes.

Any other ways of approaching it perhaps? - I think the problem that there is with that sort of contact with the police is that they are not permitted to declare or make any statement about anybody's criminal record. We would certainly like to find some way in which the declaration that somebody is not prohibited from having a firearm under Section 21 of the Act, to verify that would be useful. How it would be done I couldn't comment.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. TAYLOR: The club of/

of which you are a member is based in Bearsden, is that correct? - That is correct.

Are you able to say in which police area most of the members of the club will reside? - The bulk of the members will reside in the Strathclyde Police area.

And can you tell me if a .22 rifle is a rifle of the same calibre as a .223 rifle? - It is a rifle with a barrel which has the same diameter. However, the .223 cartridge is a centre fire cartridge which is physically much larger than what everybody calls the .22 which is known as the .22 long rifle. It is not possible to chamber one of those cartridges in a gun of the other type.

And are the two used in different disciplines? - Yes.

RE-EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMOY: Are you aware of a form which has to be signed now by all members of Home Office approved clubs in which they certify they are not prohibited from possessing a firearm or ammunition by virtue of Section 21 of the Firearms Act? - Yes, all clubs have had to have these on their premises since the 1st of January this year.

Does that requirement apply only to Home Office approved clubs? - Yes.

MR. BONOMOY: There is no other evidence arranged for today, sir. There may be certain brief evidence tomorrow and the principal witnesses will then be Mr. Penn for whom special arrangement has been made to come in the morning and Professor Cooke with whom an arrangement has been made to come in the afternoon.

LORD CULLEN: Very well. We will adjourn now until 10 a.m. tomorrow.

Adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m.

TWENTY-SECOND DAY.

LORD CULLEN: Yes, Mr. Bonomy?

MR. BONOMOY: Thank you, sir. The first witness this morning is David John Penn

DAVID JOHN PENN, (51), Sworn,

EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMOY: Can you tell us first of all what your job is? - I am the Keeper of the Department of Exhibits and Firearms at the Imperial War Museum.

How long have you been doing that? - I have been Keeper of Firearms since 1974.

Your interest in firearms is obviously professional. Is it a professional interest that first involved you with firearms? - No, I started shooting very early in life. I first fired a firearm when I was five years old. I first owned my own air weapon at 11 and I have been seriously involved in target shooting and increasingly for competition purposes since I was 13.

Are you a member of a shooting club? - Yes.

Which club? - Marylebone Rifle and Pistol Club, the National Rifle Association and various other ones.

Is the Marylebone Pistol and Rifle Club a big club? - Yes, it has about 330 members.

Is that typical of rifle and shooting clubs? - It is a little larger than many of them but in other ways it is typical.

Is it also a social club? - Yes.

Can you tell us something of the social element? - The club has attached to it a large area where people may sit, have a light meal, discuss matters of the day, read journals and magazines/magazines and most of them talk about shooting and related interests. They will arrange visits occasionally to places of interest for the members.

We have heard descriptions in this Inquiry of clubs of a quite different nature which are little more than tin huts on a hill. Do you know what the whole range of shooting club premises is throughout the United Kingdom? - They vary. Some clubs, and I would say this is an increasing tendency, will if they can afford it acquire their own premises. For pistol clubs that is reasonably straightforward. Most competition shooting takes place at 20 yards or 25 metres so you can build entirely enclosed premises which are perfectly safe in any environment, including the urban environment. The Marylebone Club is in fact under a major office building in the City of London. There are, however, many clubs which use other ranges. They might either use another club or association range. For example, the National Rifle Association ranges at Bisley are used as their home range by a whole variety of clubs in the south-east of England. Very commonly, military ranges, Ministry of Defence ranges, will be hired by civilian clubs for target shooting practice. This is extremely well established, going on very much since the inception of modern military ranges in the late 19th Century.

You have been describing there indoor and outdoor ranges. Can you say how much of handgun shooting is carried out outdoors? - Quite a lot. You can shoot competitions by and large either indoors or outdoors, the exception being the 50 metre precision events. There are very few indoor 50 metre ranges so it is almost exclusively an outdoor sport. They can be shot indoors or outdoors but it is largely a matter of availability of the ranges.

Now, you are on the Council of the British Shooting Sports Council? - That is correct, I am Chairman of the Technical and Research Committee.

The Council itself is an umbrella organisation? - Yes.

For how many other organisations? - Most of the members of target shooting and gaming shooting organisations in this country. I could go through/through them if you wish.

No, we heard evidence yesterday about an organisation called the Scottish Target Shooting Federation. Are they a distinct body? - They are. They are not in the British Shooting Sports Council.

Which is the member body that you are also on? - I am a member of the Muzzle Loaders Association of Great Britain and Vice-President.

Are you a member of the National Pistol Association? - I was at one time.

And have you formerly held high office in that organisation? - Yes, for many years I was Vice-Chairman.

In your statement we also have an indication of your shooting history, that you are past Shooting Captain of the club, Marylebone Rifle and Pistol Club? - Yes.

And you are past Secretary and Captain of the Oxford University Pistol Club? - That is correct.

And then Chairman of the Museum Weapons Group. Is that really something that has come from the combined effect of your interest in recreational shooting and your work? - I would agree with you, yes, because I have had to get a good working knowledge of the law which applies equally to museums as it does to private individuals.

Have you written on the subject of shooting? - Yes.

Extensively? - I wouldn't say extensively. Probably a dozen or two articles over the years and certain chapters in certain books but I have also prepared papers for specific purposes, for instance the Firearms Consultative Committee, and I have given talks to Police Forces.

And the Firearms Consultative Committee would be concerned with legislation and reform of the legislation? - That is what it was set up for, yes.

Did/

Did you give evidence to the House of Commons Home Affairs Committee on their review of firearms? - Yes, I did.

Was that earlier this year? - That is correct.

In what shooting disciplines do you have the most experience? - Target shooting disciplines. When I was young I shot small bore rifle and target rifle through my school. I continued shooting small bore rifle into my 20's but most of my target shooting experience has been with either pistols or muzzle-loading firearms, in which I have a particular interest. That is both rifle and pistol. I have been shooting muzzle-loading rifles and pistols.

Do you still compete? - Yes, I do although not as seriously as in the past.

I think we have had some difficulty in the course of the Inquiry in pinning down just how much shooting activity at local clubs is strictly speaking competitive rather than simply recreational. Can you help us with that? - Again, it is pretty much what the individual wants to make of it. There are a wide range of club events normally which are run in-house. It is pretty much up to the club how much it wants to run an internal competition programme. There are also what are known as postal competitions. This takes place for both small bore and full bore pistol. This involves you competing against a wide range of individuals nationally in leagues by shooting at your home club and submitting your targets and results. The shooter may then, if he wishes to do so, and this may either be on a club initiative or a club team or his own initiative, enter as an individual. He may choose to go into competitions at regional or national level. That is all quite straightforward and these are well advertised and if he wishes to compete he merely sends in his application and then turns up at the event so it is largely individually led, the extent to which a person gets involved in competition shooting.

If at the end of a hard day I want to go to the club just to do some shooting for recreational purposes and I discover there are two or/or three other people there at the same time, would a range officer take over and discipline us as we shot together? - It is normal practice at any club to have someone in charge of the shooting detail. There will be a nominated person. He may do it full-time or they may nominate suitably competent individuals from among those present. It is not usual these days for people to just turn up at a range and shoot. That is a past practice at enclosed gallery ranges but about the only one that operates on that basis these days is at the National Rifle Association at Bisley where there is an old-fashioned gallery range.

So normally when I go to the club it will be because it is a club night and I would anticipate other members being there to shoot? - That is entirely the normal procedure.

And in these circumstances would there be scope for simply recreational shooting for my own enjoyment but would I in that context also have to shoot along with other people? - Yes, it depends on the physical arrangements of the range. Some ranges have automatic electronic returning targets or hand-cranked returning targets for each individual shooter's target. In a range with that arrangement it is pretty much up to the shooter what he wants to do. So he can shoot quickly or he can practice a particular course of fire or he can zero a gun, do what he wishes. Other clubs, where you don't have this facility, are shot in details and he will normally run for about 10 or 12 minutes and during that 10 or 12 minutes you shoot when you wish to shoot and then a halt will be called. Everyone will go forward, change their targets, come back and you will resume another detail. There is a club arrangement where what normally happens if there is to be a serious competition going on that will be given priority within the club so 6 until 8 will be competition shooting and after 8 the club will go back to practice and recreational shooting. That would be the normal sort of approach.

And practice and recreational means you are not shooting against your neighbour, you are just shooting either for your own enjoyment or perhaps to see how well you are getting on in the sport? - That is correct. It is like every sport./

sport. You have to practice for a competition but you may wish just to practice for practice's sake.

What does zeroing a gun mean? - It is adjusting normally the sight on the firearm to ensure that it shoots precisely at your chosen point of aim. Firearms are shot slightly differently from individual to individual. This is because of the weight of the individual and the way he grips the firearm. Possibly his sight may have an effect on this so the individual will wish to tune the firearm to himself and to the ammunition he is using and when he has got it zeroed then he can be confident if he takes a known point of aim it will put the bullet into the centre of the target.

Now, you cover a number of issues in your statement as you were invited to. I won't necessarily take them in the order in which they appear here because of course as the evidence has been read here certain issues have become clearer and others not so clear and I would like to start at the area of the weapons which Thomas Hamilton actually had. He had semi-automatic or self-loading weapons which were full bore weapons. Now, can you tell me first of all what proportion roughly of target shooting sport is conducted using these weapons in the United Kingdom? - I looked at some figures provided by the National Pistol Association which I would like to refer to. The National Pistol Association is, as the name indicates, exclusively concerned with pistol shooting. It has 438 affiliated clubs. Of these a minimum of 324 shoot some centre-fire disciplines. If I can go through the figures. Bearing in mind the figure is 438 in total.....

Can I be clear about the terminology first of all. I say full bore and you say centre-fire. Now, what should we be saying? - Either term is acceptable. Centre-fire is a general term. Full bore is a peculiarly British term which derives from the Army practices in the certificating ranges. Both are correct. You may equate in these circumstances full bore and centre-fire as the same thing.

And do both cover a certain range of calibres? - Yes.

And/

And can you tell us what that is? - In centre-fire the calibres range from point..... well, technically 2 mm although that is obsolete rounds up to for pistol purposes to cartridges of 577 but that again is an obsolete round. The normal range for centre-fire will run from .22 centre-fire up to 50 calibre for pistol.

That is in current use? - In current use, yes.

And for rifles? - From .17 up to .7 of an inch.

Anyway, we are talking about the same subject? - We are talking about the same subject, yes.

It is helpful to be clear about it so can I just let you carry on now please? -

The/

The National Pistol Association asks its clubs what disciplines they shoot. Of the 438 clubs, 342 indicate they shoot club pistol. This is a .22 event, and it is normally a slow fire event, a fairly basic precision shooting event. 302 of them shoot UIT small bore pistols, handguns or sport pistol, and 110 shoot Olympic rapid fire discipline.

Of the clubs, 255 shoot UIT centrefire competitions, 324 shoot police pistol, which is centrefire, 276 shoot service pistol, which is centrefire, 188 shoot practical pistol, which is centrefire, 100 shoot classic pistol, which is mainly centrefire, and 74 shoot long range pistol, which is exclusively centrefire. So of the approximately 438 clubs in the NPA at least 75 per cent are shooting centre pistol.

Yes? - Figures from the National Rifle Association also indicate a substantial use of centrefire pistols. There are 2118 Home Office-approved clubs in this country. Of those, 1049 are approved for centrefire pistol as a discipline and 1395 are approved for small bore pistol as a discipline.

I must point out that a lot of older indoor ranges in this country were provided for .22 calibre only. There are a lot of clubs that use these ranges that may not have a facility for centrefire.

The tendency with modern indoor ranges -- except those held in schools -- is that the modern ranges would be built to accommodate centrefire pistol as well, because it increases the flexibility of the range.

Are you able to say within these statistics what the actual proportion of centrefire has against small bore activity is? - I would say at the very least 50 per cent is going to be centrefire pistol shooting.

Would the same apply to rifle shooting, in general terms? - No. There tends to be a difference there in the sort of ranges used and the type of clubs. It is a different set-up.

Can/

Can you assist me in identifying how much of that 50 plus per cent of centrefire activity involves the use of semi-automatic or self-loading pistols, handguns? - I would say the trend is towards semi-automatic pistols. There are still a lot of revolvers in use, but I would expect with centrefire it is going to be probably slightly more self-loaders these days. For .22 target shooting the .22 self-loading pistols are in the great majority, much more than used than either revolvers or single shots.

I am sorry? The .22.....? The .22 self-loading pistols are in the great majority, much more commonly used.

Of the self-loading pistols within the .22 category? - You can use self-loading pistols, revolvers or single shot, but self-loaders are in the vast majority.

In centrefire what proportion involves shooting with self-loading weapons rather than single shot weapons? - I'm afraid there has to be two ways of looking at this, and I would like to put them both to you.

Yes? - If you look at the competition available, the majority of competitions these days favour self-loading pistols, so if you are going to be competing seriously you are probably using a self-loader. For recreational shooting or shooting at a lower level you could still use a revolver, however.

If you were looking at the overall use of self-loading pistols and revolvers, self-loading pistols are slightly more used than revolvers, but revolvers are used more for recreational purposes than for high level competition shooting.

The question I am trying to put to you is the distinction between the use of self-loading pistols and revolvers on the one hand and the extent to which single shot weapons are used in centrefire? - I misunderstood you. Single shot weapons are very, very little used in centrefire. The UIT regulations forbid those in centrefire.

On the other hand, in relation to small bore/bore are self-loading pistols and revolvers more greatly used than single shot weapons? - Yes, the normal use for single shot weapons in .22 calibre these days falls into two areas: one is for a basic club trainer, because it is safer for a beginner. The other is a UIT competition where they are mandatory, called the 50 metre free pistol precision event.

What proportion of small bore shooting is done with single shot handguns? - I would say well under five per cent.

And strictly speaking, what proportion of full bore shooting is done with single shot weapons? - Apart from specialised long range events there is no common use of centrefire single shots.

If as a result of this whole investigation some restrictions emerge, and one of these was the abolition of multi-shot weapons, what effect would that have on the shooting sport? - It would virtually eliminate pistol shooting in its present form in this country.

If we look at another possibility, the restriction of handguns to .22 calibre, but not restricting the self-loading element, what effect would that have on shooting sport in this country? - It would substantially reduce the range of interests, obviously. The .22 calibre long rifle cartridge has not significantly evolved over the last 30 years. There have been very minor improvements, hardly perceptible, in the .22 handguns during that period. There is not therefore a developmental challenge that you find in other areas of the sport, which is one of the great things about the sport, that people try different things to improve their accuracy in relation to their ammunition. This aspect would be removed, and this is a strong attraction to many shooters.

It has been suggested earlier that it is the case the .22 rounds cannot be developed any further? - The .22 round has been subjected to very minor attempts at development, but it really has not progressed. It seems to work absolutely fine as it is. It is the highest precision cartridge available.

What/

What is the difference in composition between a .22 centrefire and a .22 rimfire cartridge? - A .22 rimfire cartridge, the cartridge case itself is made of light metal, which is necessary because the rim of the cartridge case itself has to be crushed by the firing pin to ignite the cartridge. This means that the cartridge case itself is incapable of withstanding very high pressure. The .22 is a relatively low pressure round, which fires a lead alloy bullet at a very sedate velocity of about 1100 feet per second.

Yes? - We cannot significantly improve the rimfire performance. With centrefire, the .22 can be pretty much what you want to make of it. It will use a very strong brass cartridge case capable of a large amount of powder, therefore the bullet can be given a much higher velocity than the rimfire. It is quite possible to fire centrefire .22 at velocities in excess of 3,000 feet per second.

Yes? - The bullet itself will not just be a simple lead alloy projectile, but a projectile where the lead core is encased in a harder outer surface. This enables it to be driven up the bore at a much greater velocity, with no leading effect.

Yes? - The net result is that you get a cartridge capable of longer range, and also with significantly greater lethality.

The main use of .22 centrefire in rifles is for vermin destruction of medium sized vermin, like foxes, and in countries where handgun hunting is permitted, for instance the USA, these are also used with fairly identical cartridges as a vermin hunting weapon.

Yes? - There would not be much use in this country at present for .22 centrefire. The main use in handguns in this country is for longer range target pistol shooting, 200, 300 yards, even 1,000 yards, and they tend to use 7.62 calibre.

One of the problems you highlighted if shooting was restricted to .22 calibre was the state of development and the lack of opportunity of improvement. Would that problem not be removed if in fact the .22 calibre is centrefire? - You would be/

be back to the problem you already had, because the routing of development would be towards more powerful cartridges, not less powerful, and the .22 centrefire in its already developed form is an already significantly more powerful firearm than a rimfire.

But not anything like as lethal as a 9mm round? - If you are pushing it at a high enough velocity it is more lethal. You can approach current military rifle performance with a handgun.

Do you get the same variety of structure of ammunition in a .22 as you do in the full bore ammunition, namely round nosed or hard nosed types, semi-wadcutter and the hollow point? - I would like to answer that in two parts. If I could first talk about .22 rimfire.

Certainly? - Normally for target shooting purposes .22 rimfire is made of round nose. It has been made for target shooting purposes in a semi-wadcutter form. It is not however particularly popular these days.

.22 rimfire is also made with hollow point ammunition, because it is a very useful vermin destruction cartridge, particularly for rabbit sized animals. So .22 hollow point ammunition is widely distributed.

You can also get a high velocity rate .22 rifle which increases the energy of the round by very approximately 30 per cent. That is used for humane vermin destruction. A .22 high velocity hollow point round will normally function in all .22 rifles.

Are they used for target shooting? - Yes. The only normal use for high velocity hollow point .22 is for target shooting.

Why are they used for that? - The higher the velocity means that you don't have to lead the target so much, aim in front of it.

Is standard velocity hollow point used for target shooting? - It might be. Standard velocity hollow point is mainly intended to be used in moderated firearms, firearms with silencers on them, / them, which are used for normally culling purposes, culling rabbits. A .22 standard velocity hollow point made to the same accuracy level is a target cartridge.

Yes? - It is still perfectly adequate for this vermin destruction purposes. The tendency would be for people to use a standard solid .22 live cartridge for target shooting.

While dealing with hollow point, we have heard evidence that hollow point ammunition is available in 9mm calibre for target shooting. Is there any particular reason why it needs to be available in that form for target shooting? - Most, nearly all of the hollow point ammunition that is available on the market is designed as an expanding bullet, for police or self-defence purposes. This is very widely available in the market place, in that it is made in huge quantities, therefore it is usable.

Yes? - There's no reason why a hollow nosed cartridge may be less accurate than any other design. Since the only criterion for most target shooting purposes is how accurate it is, the hollow point happens to be the most accurate, and we tend to use it.

Now, there are some hollow nosed cartridges which are made for competition shooting. They are jacketed round. The lead core has to go into the jacket, so one end has to be open.

I see? - Now, in fact you get better target accuracy if the lead core goes in from the front and you have a solid base on the cartridge.

Yes? - You have one line of cartridges, the Sierra, which is specifically designed for target shooting and has a hollow point, because the core goes into the front of the jacket rather than the back.

Is hollow point ammunition used throughout the world for target shooting? - By and large, yes.

Is it used in UIT competitions? - It may be, but very few shooters would choose to use that. In/

In UIT centrefire normally they would be using a firearm which is regulatory a full wadcutter cartridge.

Is there any significant problem to be faced by target shooters if they do not have access to hollow point ammunition? - It would mean that the range of bullets available to them would be reduced, and one also has to accept -- this is a difficult point, but there is a crossover problem. A lot of cartridges which are looked on as pistol cartridges can also be used in rifles, and they are normally used in rifles for humane game shooting, for which purpose you would need an expanding bullet.

I am confining my questions at the moment to target shooting. Would there be any inherent problems for target shooters if they were denied access to hollow point ammunition? - They would have to seek an equally accurate non-hollow point bullet, but they could probably find one.

In relation to full bore shooting, is the main use of the hollow point ammunition for moving targets? - No.

Can you clarify that for me? - The main use of full bore hollow point ammunition is for game hunting.

But in target shooting? - In the target shooting area there is no significant use of hollow point ammunition that is designed for expansion for private rifle shooting. A lot of target bullets which are made for high precision are technically hollow point, because the core goes into the jacket, but the front of the jacket is then closed over the top.

If for example these particular rounds that you are describing were used on a human would they expand within the body? - They might do. Frankly it would not particularly matter, because once you get beyond 2200 feet per second you get a cavitation effect, which gives you massive trauma, even with a solid projectile.

It has been suggested to the Inquiry that significantly more damage is caused by expanding ammunition/ammunition to the body than by other forms of ammunition. Now, everything is relative, in that in themselves these rounds are lethal: but is it fair to say that significant more damage is caused to the structure of the body by expanding ammunition? - Yes, it can be.

But that would not be so true of the type you have just been describing? - It is not designed to do that, therefore it probably would not expand as well.

So there is a technical problem in relation to what would be the definition of hollow point and expanding ammunition? - It is a definitional problem, yes.

And there is added accuracy for the target shooter, in that that involves inserting the bullet from the front and encasing it in its jacket, pulling the jacket over the top of it? - Yes.

And that applies to pistol shooting as well? - Yes. There is one range of very highly regarded ammunition that is made in this way by Sierra.

Just to complete this area of ammunition, do people home load .22 centrefire ammunition? - Yes.

Can you help us with the extent to which ammunition is produced by home loading in general? - Very widely. Obviously rimfire is not susceptible to being loaded, so we are talking about centrefire ammunition. It is my feeling that probably at least 70 per cent of centrefire of pistol ammunition in this country is home loaded.

Hamilton/

11.00 a.m.

Hamilton was an individual who used only commercially purchased ammunition, and some witnesses have suggested that that was highly unusual, almost exceptional. Is that a fair description of someone who does that? - I would agree.

That ties in with a description you often read when you become involved in a Inquiry like this and comments are thrown at you from all directions, of a sort of macho personality who enjoys the possession or the ownership of weapons rather than the sport of target shooting, and the suggestion that that type of personality has developed with the increase in interest in self-loading pistols and full bore revolvers. Are you conscious of that type of person appearing on the scene in the last 25 or 30 years? - I think that one has to be careful about judging by appearances here. It is my experience that the technological changes in the sport, for instance by the introduction of electronic timers, do enable competitions to be developed which are rather different from the old precision slow fire shooting. That is one approach to shooting at one end, but like many other sports, there can be a whole range of different approaches within the sport. You have it in ballroom dancing; you have it in track events; you have it in field events in athletics, so there's not one time form of shooting. Technological development has opened new avenues to new sorts of competition. Some of these will involve rapid fire; some of them will include in their parameters the use of a heavy calibre weapon. This tends to make it an attractive sport for the younger, fitter, more athletic person. .22 slow fire shooting is a bit like Zen archery. What you are trying to do is to precisely replicate some series of aims time after time, and if you do that precisely enough, you put all your bullets into a very small group and get a high score, but you can have other competition parameters that for instance include having to make mental judgments while you are shooting, which can include firing movement. All of these will attract a slightly different personality, possibly a younger, physically fitter personality, so the old image of shooting which might be considered rather staid, the slow fire attitude,/ attitude, has been replaced by a younger, fitter sort of shooter in that sort of competition. Whether that makes them more macho, I don't know.

I take the point you are making and I would like to develop that particular point in a moment. Before doing that, can I ask you the question again about whether you are conscious of the type of personality I had mentioned appearing on the scene who is more interested in actually owning, handling, possessing the gun, talking about the gun, than actually participating in target shooting, and perhaps he isn't in the sport with the right motivation? - You can get a wide range of pleasures out of the possession of firearms. You have got some people who are purely collectors who never wish to fire their weapon, whose sole interest is having it as an object. I am at least in part among that number, and I consider that I and the other collectors I know have a very serious antiquarian interest in the subject. It is certainly true that some people do get at least as much pleasure out of the ownership of the firearm as they will out of the shooting of it. I cannot see that necessarily makes it a bad thing.

Is it right to say that over these years, the 25 or 30 years I am talking about, the interest in the police pistol, service pistol, practical type of pistol activity has greatly increased? - Yes.

In fact, did these disciplines develop after the War or did they exist before the War? - Pistol shooting in Britain has always tended to have a military basis. When pistol shooting was developed seriously as target shooting in this country in the 80's, it was very very closely tied to military practice. You were required to use a revolver that was fit for service and had a suitable calibre for service. The tendency in Britain from the earliest days was to come at the sport from a military point of view. The small bore tradition is a slightly different one. If anywhere, it grew up in France and it became more important with the development of UIT shooting, but .22 shooting took root in this country quite early, so military style shooting is not new.

You did mention rapid fire competition and a developing interest in that? - Yes.

But did you also mention that UIT competitions include rapid fire competitions? - Yes; it is a highly stylised type of rapid fire.

It is shot at five targets and it uses a self-loading pistol or revolver, but in practice, nobody uses a revolver. It uses a five shot normally, self-loading pistol, chambered from lower down and the calibre is known as the .22 shot. That calibre is used to minimise the recoil effect of the pistol and it enables you to use the pistol and fire five shots at five targets very rapidly and then turn away again.

Is it correct to say that there are UIT competitions which require the use of full bore self-loading pistols and revolvers? - Yes, there is a UIT centre fire event which includes both slow fire and rapid fire.

So just to be absolutely clear then, if competition in the UK were to be restricted to .22 calibre weapons, what do you say the effect on target shooting sport would be? - Very, very, very major. Obviously it would restrict people only to 22s. I think what would tend to happen is that you would get surrogate centre fire events designed for use with .22 weapons, so in fact courses that are presently shot with centre fires, people would tend to shoot with 22's, so there might be a 22 police pistol event if that is all that was possible.

That would suggest that people could adapt to the sort of change I am hinting at? - Within the UK, I suppose they could, but it would for practical purposes remove Great Britain from international target shooting as a sport, because I can see no reason whatsoever why other nations would wish to follow our lead in this matter. Other nations seem to accept that shooting is perfectly acceptable as a sport.

Would there therefore be any significant difference between restricting competition shooting to .22 and banning handguns completely? - There would still be many shooters who would carry on the sport as best they could within any limitations that were laid down.

And/

And just to complete that part of the picture, if there was a combination of restricting self-loading and pistols and revolvers to .22, but retaining full bore weapons as single shot only, that would have more or less the same effect? - For all practical purposes, yes.

In your statement, you deal with the use of single shot handguns? - Yes.

At the beginning, and we can read there what you say, but is the effect of what you say there, plus what you are saying today, that single shot handguns are really only used for competition purposes at .22 calibre? - Apart from a relatively obscure long-range pistol shooting, yes.

So far as accuracy is concerned, is there some difference between a .22 weapon and a centre fire weapon? - As we have already discussed, the .22 is highly involved and it is inherently very accurate, as are virtually all the pistols made for it. Absolute pin-point accuracy may not necessarily be the main criterion with centre fire weapons. You may wish to have another balance and attributes, for instance we have already talked about power. There are some competitions which require the use of a more powerful firearm, for instance there are some action pistol competitions where you are trying to knock them down, a solid target, and obviously you require a heavier calibre weapon for that.

And are they necessarily less accurate? - They may be. You are striving for an appropriate balance for the competition, and there is a tendency these days for increasing specialisation of weapons for each competition. There will be still centre fire displays, for instance UIT centre fire where precision accuracy will be of a premium, and there will be others where other factors such as complete functional reliability will be also at a premium, possibly at the expense of some degree of accuracy.

But if it comes to knocking over a target because you have to strike it simply with a degree of force, presumably in a range of areas or a fairly large area over the surface? - Yes.

Presumably/

Presumably an accurate weapon is as good as a less accurate weapon for that purpose? - Oh yes; obviously you would want the best accuracy you could achieved.

If I set up a tripod and fix a .22 pistol to it and let it fire so that when you take the human element away, we would then see just how accurate the pistol was on its own? - That is correct.

And you say that is highly accurate? - Yes.

Can I do the same with a self-loading pistol or revolver? - You would wish to fire either a 22, which has some recoil, or centre fire weapon from a rest which would take account of the recoil, but there are such rests made for testing of firearms.

Would the centre fire weapon be less accurate than the .22? - It depends on the centre fire weapon, but I would say on average, any centre fire weapon, even the best of them, will tend to be slightly less accurate than the 22.

If we take the standard Browning hi-power service pistol, how accurate would it be when compared with a .22? - Significantly less accurate.

This/

11.00 a.m.

This is a major subject that we have been touching on and your evidence has been very helpful and I daresay we could discuss it for a long time but there are other issues that I would like to turn to, individual issues on their own. At present a self-loader can acquire all the elements necessary to make his own ammunition without having a Firearms Certificate? - Yes, that is possible.

With the exception I presume of the original case? - No, you can buy an empty case or a primed case without showing a certificate or having any certificate.

You can buy the lot? - You can buy the lot. The only restriction is an extremely small number of projectiles which are covered by the legislation. These are in fact service hollow point but that is a very minor detail.

It is perceived by a number of people as something which should not occur, that where you can identify elements as essentially component parts of a round of ammunition you should require a Firearms Certificate to buy them. Do you see any practical problems about imposing such restrictions? - It depends on the nature of the restrictions. If you can draw an analogy with the purchase of shotgun cartridges in this country, which of course are extremely widely used in the community in very large numbers. To buy shotgun cartridges you have to produce your Shotgun Certificate. All you do is show it. There is no entry made on the certificate for the purchase of shotgun ammunition. I can personally see no reason why for instance primers could not be sold on the same basis. In other words, you show your Firearms Certificate, having proof you have a certificate for centre-fire pistol ammunition to buy your primers.

Could that not be done in relation to the other elements as well? The bullet for example? - You have a problem with bullets because people can make their own bullets and you have many, many people who do. Either by casting or swadging them up from hunks of lead. That is a common thing to do so you can homemade bullets without any problem.

You can homemade a lot of things you are not/not supposed to homemade of course and perhaps we just have to accept that certain things should be outlawed. Would it be practical to outlaw the making of bullets by individual persons? - Given the very large numbers of bullet moulds that have been on sale since the 19th Century and their ready availability in other parts of the world and all you need is some scrap lead and something to melt it in, I hardly think that is practical.

What about the powder then? - Yes, you could control the powder. Possibly against a certificate but again there are alternative sources of powder. For instance, by breaking down shotgun cartridges to get the powder out. Shotgun propellant is quite a satisfactory pistol propellant.

What about the magazines? - Essentially the same problems as with the bullet moulds. The magazines at present are on unrestricted sale in this country. They are not numbered normally. Some older firearms have a magazine which is numbered to a particular gun because they were hand-fitted but most modern magazines are unnumbered and no one knows how many have been sold and no one knows how many people have in their possession and they are readily available in other parts of the world so it is essentially a stable door problem. You could introduce a restriction now but its effects are very uncertain.

I suppose there is no real practical difficulty about identifying magazines by putting a number on them? - It would be a massive task and then all you would know about is the magazines that have been numbered. Any magazine had not been declared would still be floating around and any magazine that was illegally imported unnumbered would still be floating around and one has to remember that a number per se does not stop crime. It is merely part of an audit system to work out what happened usually after the event.

Yes, I accept the point you make about crime and the difficulty of imposing an effective restriction there because of the current position? - Yes.

But what we are dealing with in this case is/

is a man who followed the rules and was in legitimate possession of items and if we were to assume that the shooting public would wish to follow the rules and do as they were required, would it not be practical in fact to introduce a restriction which would mean that magazines were identifiable? - What you would then end up with is a situation where shooters.....let's say for argument's sake shooter A has six magazines now. You would go through a considerable process of marking the magazines, of recording them in some way, presumably entering them on to his certificate and at the end of the day you have a shooter who has six magazines on them entered in various places as a record but he has still got the six functioning magazines that he started out with.

Now, it might be possible to combine that with a restriction which meant that the magazines and any ammunition associated with them could be kept separate from the weapon. In other words, kept at the club. What practical problems would that create for sporting shooters or target shooters? - It rather depends on the individual. Some shooters shoot at only one place. They are a member of one club and use one range, but a very large proportion of shooters travel to shoot at other ranges. They will go to competitions. They may be a member of a club for instance which has got its own .22 range on the premises but uses another facility for full bore. He might go to Bisley. So you would have a very large proportion of shooters who for certain periods of time would still need to have in their personal possession a firearm, a magazine and the ammunition if they were allowed to compete at all. As far as I can see, the only way of getting that aspect out of the equation would be to completely ban the present system of competition shooting and restrict people to only one range but, again, I think that would effectively ruin the sport.

For people who have to travel to away shooting, is there any reason why they can't simply pick up their weapon and ammunition on the way and take them back in later? - That is of course a possibility. You have to bear in mind that many clubs function infrequently and they are not permanently staffed. If a club shoots only once a month and he did want to go competition shooting he would/would have everything in his hands for a month. If he shoots once a week he might have everything in his hands for a week to cover the competition period. So one then begins to question whether this would really significantly affect the issue. If someone really wished to undertake a serious crime using his own firearm and ammunition, he would merely come up with the colour of an excuse by entering in a competition, checking out his firearm, his ammunition and his magazine and then carrying out his actions.

It may be because of great public anxiety however, that exceptional measures have to be taken and these measures which do involve a change in practice by those who benefit from the sport and enjoy the sport and that might mean going to a different place from those at present to actually collect the ammunition and weapon and bring it back afterwards and have the facility for doing that. Now, do you accept that if necessary it could be done? - I suppose it could be done but it does introduce another extremely wide range of problems. For a start, you split the responsibility. You are saying that fallible human individual A will not take entire responsibility for his firearm and ammunition but you are introducing into the equation fallible human individual B, presumably some official of the club who will have to take charge of these separate items and be responsible for the issue and return of them. By split responsibility if something goes wrong, and that is when the question arises, you will also get a dispute as to where responsibility lies and you would create an extremely cumbersome situation which is still open to human error and to human abuse.

And that is really because people do travel regularly to compete in shooting in venues other than their own club? - Absolutely.

What about the need that target shooters have at present to load their own ammunition or make their own ammunition? Could that task be undertaken in club premises so that the ammunition could in fact stay there? - There would be great difficulties, aside from the fact that many clubs don't actually have a suitable building in which this could take place. This is not the sort of thing you can do out of the boot of the car in the open/open with any hope of success I suspect. You have to have a place where the ammunition is loaded. Now, you have to accept that this requires concentration and precision. You are using measures, scales and so on so you have the potential of going to produce an unsafe round. If someone is doing that he should be doing it in calm, quiet conditions where preferably he is alone. I would suspect that normal club premises with people milling around taking guns out of lockers and cleaning weapons and chatting to each other and going on and off the range is not conducive to that. You also have to accept that loading ammunition may take a rather long time so you would have queues of people waiting to get into the facility to load their ammunition for shooting. I honestly don't believe it to be practical and I also believe it is very questionable on the safety aspect.

Why do you say that? - Because of the circumstances in which the person is trying to load explosives into the cartridge.

We have heard evidence that magazines have varying capacities. What is the largest capacity that is in wide use in competition? - Probably the 18 round magazine in the Glock but there are extension magazines for 20 rounds as we know from this case.

I am wondering whether for example if a magazine were restricted to say five or six rounds, if that would have a significant effect on competition? - It would certainly affect Practical Pistol and one or two other competitions that require a significant string of shots to be fired quickly but you have to accept that any pistol shooter with a reasonable level of skill can change one magazine for another in well under two seconds so it won't significantly affect the rate of fire. He would just need more magazines.

Would it disadvantage a British target shooter in competition elsewhere? - In Practical Pistol shooting absolutely because Practical Pistol shooting is time-measured in fractions of a second.

But apart from Practical Pistol shooting, would it affect the British competitor? - It might do in one or two other events but I have to say I can't/can't think of one immediately.

Now, can existing magazines be modified to restrict capacity? - I think it is possible probably by either crimping the sides or by inserting a pillar into the magazine preventing the follower going too far down.

What is the average price of a magazine for six rounds or five or six rounds of ammunition? - Well, there is no difference in price at the moment significantly based on capacity. A magazine may be as cheap as £12 or as expensive as £25. You have to accept that magazines are actually semi-disposable. If they are damaged they are normally just thrown away and replaced.

Just to complete the picture on this; with your experience of shooting clubs, and forget for the moment the practical problem of collecting and travelling and so on, would it be physically possible to store weapons at a club for members of the club? - It depends on the club. As we have indicated earlier, there are a number of clubs that have no premises of their own. If they have club guns they are normally kept by the Secretary at his home so what you would be doing is requiring a club official in these circumstances to store everything. Again, one has to accept there would be a very, very significant bureaucratic burden involved here because if you are talking about parts of a Section One firearm you may be talking also about certificate accountability for these. In other words, that there would have to be legal authorities to possess all those parts belonging to the club members.

Now, I think in your statement at Section 11 you deal in considerable detail with the storage of ammunition at club premises? - Yes.

And you make a number of significant points in there, a number of points you have made as we have taken your evidence this morning. Is there anything in that particular section that you feel you want to highlight that we have not either touched upon or can easily be read in your statement? - I would like to emphasise that you would be introducing a position where the base level of fairness in competition could be quite significantly/significantly affected if shooters had no ready access to their ammunition. This would mean that it would effectively give the home team an advantage if people had to either acquire ammunition from another club or possibly make extensive arrangements for that ammunition to be transported on their behalf to another venue. What I'm saying is that away shooters have to have their ammunition in their possession if they are to compete fairly.

MR. BONOMOY: Sir, I wish to ask Mr. Penn questions about one of Hamilton's own weapons. The weapons were not here initially to be examined but the weapons are now here. Would it be possible to have a 15-minute adjournment just now so that he could have a look at it?

LORD CULLEN: Certainly, and I think it will give the witness a break from his explanations.

After/

11.30 a.m.

After a short adjournment.

What I asked you to do was to have a look at the Browning pistol with the longer barrel, the muzzle weight and certain other apparent alterations or modifications to the safety mechanism that had either broken off or been altered in some way. Now, you have had a chance to do that? - Yes.

Can you confirm to me that the weapon is different from the other Browning? - Yes, it is. It is what is known as a Browning competition model. It is a factory-made variant for target shooting. The longer barrel and the extension and weight at the end of the barrel and the adjustable rear sight are all features introduced on to that model for target shooting.

So Hamilton had not himself made any obvious alterations to it? - The only obvious modification is to the spur of the hammer.

What has happened to it? - The spur itself has been completely removed.

Can you tell me how it has been removed, first of all? - No. I can only tell you it has been very neatly re-finished and rounded, presumably with a grinder.

Has this been done accidentally? - The re-finishing is deliberate, but the damage may have been accidental. I think the possibility that he broke the hammer spur is a real one.

Is that something which often happens? - Very rarely. If the pistol was dropped and landed on the hammer spur it could have happened like that.

Could it be replaced? - He could have bought another hammer for that pistol, but that would have required careful fitting. The pistol is set up for target or competition shooting, as a target or competition pistol. It has got a light trigger pull, which I estimate -- and this is only an estimate -- to be between 3 and 4 lbs., and it has been very well adjusted as a competition trigger, therefore Hamilton may have felt that rather/rather than go to the significant expense of having a new hammer fitted to achieve that good level of trigger pull he would rather just have cleaned up the damaged hammer.

What is the effect of the damaged spur? - It makes it nearly impossible easily to cock the pistol when the hammer is down by pulling back the trigger.

I see? - You have to retract the slide. The slide comes back, overrides the hammer, pushes it back and cocks it. Now, for target shooting purposes that would not be a very significant problem.

Are there circumstances in which target shooters modify a weapon? - Yes, there are two main ones. One is to reduce the weight of the hammer, thereby speeding the hammer forward. You get a shorter time between squeezing the trigger and the firearm firing. The lesser the time the less opportunity there is for the gun to be affected by the hand moving. We are talking about fractions of a second here. The second reason is particularly common with self-loading pistols of the Browning type, in order to avoid hammer bite.

What is that? - For someone with fleshy hands, when the pistol is gripped the flesh between the thumb and forefinger tends to ride up over the back of the frame and be nipped by the hammer when the hammer comes back, which can be painful.

Oh, I see? - Some shooters with large fleshy hands will either shorten or change the shape of the hammer.

Could that have been done in this case? - No, because normally you won't entirely remove the spur. There are some advantages of being able to cock the weapon easily without having to retract the slide.

Does the missing spur affect the trigger weight? - Not significantly.

Is it a particularly light trigger? - Not for a well tuned competition pistol. It is about normal.

Now/

Now could I move to the next section of the submission, which is about separate storage of component parts of a handgun? - Yes.

We have had some evidence to the Inquiry about the facility with which both self-loading handguns and revolvers can be dismantled, so that they cannot operate as firearms. I think you have had the opportunity to read Mr. Paton's evidence? - Yes.

I think you agree broadly with what he had to say? - I do.

There may be however certain weapons -- and he in fact dealt with more than self-loaders and revolvers; he dealt also with single shots -- there may be some where the dismantling process could cause some degradation of the weapon? - That is correct.

Does that apply to a significant number of weapons? - It applies most to self-loading .22 calibre pistols designed for target shooting. There are some of these, including one of the top competition models, the Hammerlee 208, which I use myself, whereby to remove the slide, which would be the only easily removable part, for separate storage purposes you also have to move a yoke on which the rear sight sits, and every time you do that you run the risk of losing the zero on that pistol, and you would have to re-zero it.

Yes? - I do agree that the generality of pistols and revolvers are designed to be field stripped, to be broken down into single components.

Losing the zero just means that you have to re-set it? - Yes: but continual removal and replacement of the yoke would probably ultimately loosen it.

So far as revolvers are concerned, are there any revolvers you know of in common use where there would be a problem about regular dismantling? - Not a major problem.

So apart from the one you have identified just now and the one Mr. Paton identified where you have to hammer out the pin, are there any other particular/particular features of any handguns which would cause a difficulty that might result in deteriorating the weapon? - Not that I can immediately think of, no.

So far as the objections to dismantling are concerned, if you take pistols first of all, self-loading pistols, I think you were describing the removal of a slide. Are there other easy ways of dismantling the pistol and making it ineffective? - The majority of self-loading pistols in every day use today have a slide; and so normally that pistol will break down into the components, the frame and the slide certainly and possibly also the barrel as a third major component, and also the magazine.

Yes? - There are very few pistols which do not use slides; the only common one that comes to mind is the Luger 22 pistol, which is widely available and made in large numbers, and which is used as a target pistol.

This has an internal bolt rather than a slide. It also happens to be a pistol which is not well designed for easy taking apart -- like the Hammerlee -- and putting back together. It is difficult to do.

Can the bolt be removed? - Yes.

If that is done regularly would it cause any damage to the weapon? - No.

It is simply more difficult than in other cases? - Yes.

You have set out also in your statement a number of problems which are largely related to convenience; is that right? - Yes.

And we can obviously read the difficulties there? - Yes.

I think you also mentioned the availability elsewhere of some of the component parts that might be removed from the main chunks of the weapon to render it ineffective? - Yes.

Do you see a difficulty there about a person like Hamilton replacing the part which ought to/

to be separated from the main bulk of the gun? - If you are accepting a degree of forward planning and an intention to take some trouble to ensure having a complete firearm it would be possible for components to be bought in other countries.

Within the USA normally only the frame of the pistol or revolver is registerable; other parts are on free sale. The same applies in Finland, which is a European Community country. Depending on the canton, in Switzerland any component, including the frame, may be on free sale: some cantons do, other cantons do not. I am talking about an entirely free sale.

I now want to look at the question of the relationship between the clubs and the police, and the policing of clubs. Not all clubs are Home Office-approved. In general terms do you personally see any advantage in having a requirement that there should be Home Office approval for all clubs? - Not really. Approval -- its main function is to provide a mechanism whereby a person may have temporary possession of a firearm for the purposes of target shooting within the club. This is obviously necessary if you are going to introduce new probationary members into a club. The police will not issue a firearms certificate normally to a person who is not a full member of a club, therefore you need that facility. There are other clubs which are not Home Office-approved, and if they work on that basis every single member of the club has to have a firearms certificate, therefore they will have gone through the police vetting process.

I also have to say that I think there is some difficulty in defining what a club would be in these circumstances. You are really talking about imposing on groups of already-certificated individuals a Home Office approval system which they might not feel they wanted.

The problem of identification or definition was one of the difficulties highlighted by a police witness, that perhaps the identity of all clubs in a given area is not known by the police. That is a possibility? - I think it is a possibility, yes.

Some clubs will effectively function as a means/means of a group of like-minded people getting together to shoot a certain type of firearm or a certain competition.

I happen to be a member of one such society which meets to shoot Edwardian courses and meets three or four times a year. It has a natural status in that it has a letterhead, and all the members have firearms certificates, but they get together and shoot a competition, have lunch and then go away again.

That takes me to a concern which has been expressed that when perhaps it comes to looking at the "good reason" test being genuine or renewing a certificate held by a target shooter that some attention should be paid to the amount of target shooting the applicant is actually doing at the time, and for that to be checked if that is necessary to be able to identify where he is doing his shooting, and to have some sort of ability to obtain information from that source. Now, do you see any particular problems about requiring clubs to give information to the police about shooting being done by members? - It depends on the organisation of the club as to whether they keep this sort of information. Obviously if this were to be made a requirement -- you would then still run into difficulties, because many shooters shoot at more than one location. For instance, someone who is a member of the National Rifle Association can book a range for himself and go and shoot, so he and the NRA officers are the only people who know he has made a booking. His local club would not know he had done that. If he belongs to two clubs, presumably they would not interchange information. Since different members can belong to a wide range of different clubs, the only way the information could be assessed is by the police going to every single club that a person might have a right to shoot at and checking every single competition he said he had entered.

I think perhaps the starting point would be a declaration by the applicant that he had been shooting at particular places and giving at least some guidance, so obviously in his own interests? - Yes.

And that would obviously reduce the extent to which enquiry would be necessary? - That would be one route to go.

Assuming there was such an obligation on Clubs to disclose information, would that create a particular problem for the Club? - Only that it is another piece of bureaucracy. I don't want to say it is necessarily a bad thing. It has to be borne in mind that most shooting Clubs are groups of like-minded people who gather together to enjoy their leisure activity, and they are run by amateurs in the best interests of the sport. They are not doing it as a job and fully professional, therefore one has to accept that the less pleasurable aspects of that administration, as they grow, it becomes more difficult for the Clubs to accommodate them.

There has been a suggestion in -- I think it was the Chief Inspector of Constabulary's report -- into Firearms Licensing Systems and Licensing Departments, in Scotland, that there could be detected a measure of resentment among the shooting public about the very involvement of the police at all in the administration of the system in the certification process. Do you detect that? - It largely depends on the sensitivity of the policing. The tendency in recent years has been for a number of police Forces to see this increasingly as a police service and not as a police Force. Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary's report on licensing that was recently done in England and Wales stresses the fact that the police were supposed to be giving the shooters a service and that the shooters demanded good service, and could expect good service. I think that is entirely reasonable, so provided the police do in every way conduct themselves in a proper and efficient manner, I can't see why anyone would object to it. If they don't then there may be reason for complaint.

BY/

BY LORD CULLEN: Can I ask you one question as to my own understanding of this? When somebody applies for a Firearms Certificate and he specifies target shooting as a reason, I imagine he would normally be expected to specify where he is going to do it? - That's not an absolute requirement in law. It is, however, an almost absolute requirement in practice.

So he would normally, I suppose, refer to a Club or Clubs by name? - Yes.

Am I right -- would that normally be an approved Club, or might it not be an approved Club? - The tendency would be for it to be an approved Club because if he joined an unapproved Club, he would have at that time absolutely no means of enjoying the sport because the law would prevent him using either -- well, in fact most unapproved Clubs don't have Club guns, but he couldn't get a firearm.

He couldn't get started? - Exactly.

But he could at the same time or later become a member of another Club which was not an approved Club, possibly some informal arrangement of the type you have been describing? - That is true, although for the sort of informal arrangement that you are describing, every person will be a member of another Club which he would use on a much more regular informal basis. What we are talking about there is like-minded people getting together to enjoy an aspect of the sport.

So in practical terms, for every Firearms Certificate holder, there will be at least one, if not more than one, approved Club of which he is a member? - There would be at least one Club that the police could be expected to recognise as an existing entity. It may be that some shooters as they move on, possibly change their place of residence, will have moved from an approved Club to an unapproved Club because that is what is available locally, but they will already have gone through the certification process so they will have their certificate.

But to require firearm holders to be a member of at least one Club would not represent any significant difference compared to the present situation?/

situation? - Not for most people. There may be some areas of the country where it would be physically difficult to get to an approved Club, and if that were the case and people were knocking on the doors of unapproved Clubs, it would probably encourage them to seek approval.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY: It has also been suggested that perhaps the records of some Clubs, certainly as kept at present, would not provide evidence of the extent to which a member was making use of the facility. Would you say that was fairly common, in view of what you have been saying about the attitude to bureaucracy? - I really can't say. The normal reason for keeping records or for creating records on use of a whole new range, is for members to list their names while they are waiting or queuing to go on the range, so effectively you are producing a queuing system and the range officer will call out the next detail of shooters to go forward and shoot. Whether the club bothers to keep that shoot paper thereafter is really up to them at the moment. That is the normal reason for keeping a record of shooting. There may be other forms of record of attendance, for instance if someone is buying ammunition at the Club, he would normally be expected to sign for it in some form of register or book, for good accountancy purposes as well as legal ones, so that would be an indication at least he had been there on the day.

Or if he buys ammunition from the Club, would that be recorded? - That is what I am talking about, yes.

There does appear to be a practice in some Clubs of requiring a minimum attendance? - Yes.

In the course of a year; is that common? - I can't say how common it is. I certainly know that at least one of the Clubs I am a member of makes such a requirement, yes.

But that is an attendance requirement rather than an actual shooting requirement, is it? - It is a nice distinction, yes.

So is the answer "Yes, it is a nice distinction"?

distinction"? - That is precisely the reason, yes. You have to accept that not everyone goes to the Club every time to shoot. There is a social element to most Clubs, and people will sometimes just go along for a snack and a chat. One also has to say that at some very busy Clubs you can turn up and not get on the range all evening. That has happened to me many a time because you are too late and there is too big a queue.

BY LORD CULLEN: I have heard that some shooters come along and may shoot a few rounds in order that they keep their attendance up; could that happen? - Yes, I think that is possible, but I can't see how you can differentiate between the shooters -- the mental process of the person who is on the range is a little difficult to -- I have to stress that the shooting aspect is obviously a major part of the reason for being in the Club, but there are other reasons. There are people who are perfectly proper, acceptable, respectable in this and who have a very strong interest in firearms, who may be less interested in the shooting aspect. They will shoot a bit. It is the reason for having the firearm, but they are still within the system. They are still certificated; they have been checking out, and I can't say that that interest is either more or less proper than someone who is interested entirely in the highest precision target shooting. It is just another aspect in the spectrum of interest in firearms.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY: I think the problem with that may be the very existence of the weapon at all where they are being put to little use, and that is then taken along with the suggestion that it is very difficult to predict when people's mental state might change, and they have ready access to something that they have little use for? - The difficulty here is that, as I have indicated, the interest in firearms is broad, and there is without doubt, and I am among those people, a group of people who have a strong interest in firearms as objects as opposed to sporting implements primarily. Those people also have a legitimate interest. It is very hard to differentiate between the two. A lot of collectors like to shoot a bit, and a lot of collectors like to shoot as a process of understanding the object they are studying because they want to check mental performance./ performance.

I have been asking you about Clubs. Can I just alter the direction of these questions now into the area of the umbrella organisations or bodies representing the shooters more widely? In your experience, and you are obviously very experienced in these areas, how do these shooting organisations get on with the police? - Very well. If we are talking about the National Target Shooting Association, they have excellent relations with the police, largely because large numbers of police actually shoot through them.

I think you may be the only witness to give evidence who has experience of the -- inside experience of the operation of the Firearm Consultative Committee of which -- are you still a member? - I am a member.

And have been for how long? - Since the Committee was founded in 1989.

What is the object of that Organisation? - May I quote you the law on this? The Committee was set up by Section 22 of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988. 22/1 -- "There shall be established in accordance with the provisions of this section a firearms Consultative Committee consisting of a Chairman and not less than 12 other members appointed by the Secretary of State, being persons appearing to him to have knowledge and experience of one or more of the following matters -- (a) the possession, use or keeping of, or transactions in, firearms; (b) weapon technology; and (c) the administration or enforcement of the provisions of the principal Act, the Firearms Act 1982 and this Act.

(2) the reference in sub-section 1(a) above to the use of firearms includes in particular a reference to their use for sport or competition". It then goes on about vacancies of posts and resignation. "(5) it shall be the function of the Committee, (a), to keep under review the working of the provisions mentioned in sub-section 1(c) above and to make the Secretary of State such recommendations as the Committee made from time to time think necessary for the improvement of the working of those provisions; (b), to make proposals/proposals for amending those provisions if it thinks fit and (c), to advise the Secretary of State on any other matter relating to those provisions which he may refer to the Committee.

"(6) the Committee shall in each year make a report on its activities to Secretary of State who shall lay copies of the report before Parliament", and it then goes on about payments of expenses.

Can you remind me what the provisions above are? - Yes -- sorry, it's Section 22/1 of the Act.

Sub-section 5 refers to the provisions above; what are the provisions above? - "The possession, use or keeping of, or transactions in, firearms, weapon technology, and the administration or enforcement of the provisions of the principal Act, the Firearms Act 1982 and this Act".

What in practical terms has the Firearms Consultative Committee been doing since it was set up? - If I could first say that the Consultative Committee does not consider matters relating to the use of firearms by the Armed Forces or by the police or other Crown servants, so it is very strictly looking at civilian use and training in firearms. Its function really has developed into one of looking at different sections of the existing legislation which, as you know, is actually a series of Acts, of establishing whether there are any problems connected with that part of the administration and application of the Act. If there are problems, to look into those problems and then to make recommendations. Some of these recommendations may be of a nature that they can be implemented without primary legislation. One has to say that a very large number of suggestions would require primary legislation for enactment, so effectively the Firearms Consultative Committee has been building up a study and large corpus of information to assist the Home Secretary in making future decisions of changes on primary legislation.

Now/

Now, you can take it that we know what the reports say and we know to what extent they have been implemented. It is a general picture I am looking for at the moment? - Yes.

Can you now tell me the general composition of the committee in practice? - In practice, yes. You will have ex officio a senior member of the Home Office in the Police Policy Department as it now is. The Secretariat also comes from that body. There will be a representative from the Association of Chief Constables of England and Wales and also ACPOS in Scotland. There is normally at least one and possibly two or three lawyers. At the moment there is for instance a recently retired senior Crown prosecutor and a Scottish Advocate on the board and also one solicitor. There is a representative of the Proof House. There is a representative of the Forensic Science Service and there are also individuals who will have specific knowledge of aspects either of firearms or of aspects of the shooting sports.

BY LORD CULLEN: Can you perhaps enlarge a little on what you see as being the objectives of the committee. I understand the function because you have described that first but what are the objectives in terms of interests to be pursued? - The committee reacts to suggestions and these can come from any source. So, for instance, the Home Secretary may and indeed has asked the committee to look at an area that he perceives as a problem. An example of that would be the standards for approval of clubs which have been looked into twice during the course of the committee. It may be that there will be a police interest and one or other of the senior police officers will introduce the subject for consideration. It may be that there will be a subject raised by one or other of the shooting organisations. An example of this, for instance, will be the territorial conditions on certificates relating to the use of sporting rifles. So what tends to happen is at the start of each year the committee will consider proposals that have been put forward to it from whatever source and it will chose these topics which it then considers to be most important or if it has been asked to look at a subject by the Home Secretary, obviously it would include/include that. Then those subjects will be given detailed scrutiny in the course of the year, if necessary by reference to a working party and then the conclusions will be reported to the Home Secretary.

Yes, I think that is still very much within the realms of function. What I was interested in was whether the committee conceives it has a role to play in regard to public safety? - Yes, public safety is considered to be of absolute and prime foundation to the firearms legislation and therefore everything the committee does is with a view to the public safety element as the major and prime consideration.

Some of the earlier things you were discussing sounded as though they were more concerned with making sure that existing rules operated efficiently or effectively? - This does have a public safety aspect because resources, police resources, are finite and if aspects of an administration are actually taking police resources away needlessly, that being the criteria from a public safety point of view, from other aspects of police work then it is desirable that they be entitled to use resources for other purposes.

So presumably then you're thinking about the balance between using resources on the one hand and safety on the other? - That obviously is a consideration.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY: Now, one of the things that was considered by the Firearms Consultative Committee was the question of a unique identification mark on a weapon, is that correct? - That is correct, yes.

And you in fact have written a paper for the Consultative Committee dated the 3rd of March, 1993? - Yes, I have.

Now, that has actually been given to Lord Cullen and to other parties. I don't know whether it has had a Production number. I doubt if it has. Do you have a copy there that you can now give to the Production Officer? - I am just checking to see if I have a copy with me. If you would excuse me. Yes, I do.

Now,/

Now, that was your assistance to the committee on that subject? - Yes.

Did the matter proceed any further after this paper was prepared? - I had twice suggested to the Home Office that they should get their own data processing experts to look at my paper and to indicate whether they think it is a true picture. I think it is true to say that at least one of the two Chief Constables on the committee, Dr. Ian Oliver, is convinced of the soundness of my argument.

And your argument is for or against? - My argument essentially is that if you are looking at a national database of unique identifiers, the system will not work well. The serial numbers on firearms as it exists in the real world works adequately for local audits.

So a check of the holding of a firearms dealer or of an individual certificate holder against a record on his certificate or register, that works quite well but for data retrieval, when you don't necessarily have the object before you and what you are looking through would be millions of records, I don't think the system would work.

Is there any good reason why firearms should not, like a motor car, have a unique identification number? - If you are talking from a starting point of now, no, but you have to accept that there are many old firearms in common everyday use and not all of those are numbered. The routine numbering of shotguns is really relatively recent. The same applies to 233 rifles and certain other classes of weapon. So there is no such thing as a manufacturer unique number.

Some major manufacturers number within a model or a series so you could have a number of Colt revolvers with precisely the same serial number. What you have got to know is what model of Colt it is before you have a unique statement relating to the weapon. This also holds true of military weapons because the military don't like long serial numbers so they tend to have repeat batches and require prefixes or suffixes to the number. They may require the number to be related to a date on the weapon so uniqueness is difficult to achieve because whoever is recording the firearm has to know an awful lot about the subject to make sure he is recording all the data necessary to create a unique record.

Now, /

Now, I take it the objective of having a unique way of identifying a firearm is to keep track of it? - Yes.

And that in fact might be of assistance in the detection of crime? - It might be but it very rarely is and I believe it was the New Zealand Police a few years ago when they looked at their own recording system, I think they discovered that they had never successfully tracked a firearm. If you look at the report done by Inspector Maybanks on numbers of firearms recorded in the Metropolitan Police area during a period of time, the percentage that they could, by the description and numbering, link to legal ownership was very low. I don't have the report with me but my recollection is that it was about 13 per cent. It may have been lower.

BY LORD CULLEN: Just remind me of the name of the report? - It is the Maybanks Paper.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY: Now, the other document you provided was in letter form and that is dated the 31st May, 1996 and that can actually be considered I think quite independently by the Inquiry as a description of the types of ammunition which Hamilton had and the use to which these are put? - Yes.

You indicated you also had the opportunity of reading Mr. Paton's evidence? - Yes.

And he dealt with ammunition in some detail. Do you accept what he has actually said about ammunition? - In the generality of terms, yes, but there are one or two specific statements I would take issue with.

And you deal specifically with anything you wish to say on that subject in this letter, do you? - Yes, I do.

So I can give that also a Production number and lodge the two I have here. That is the report of the Firearms Consultancy Committee and the letter as to additional Productions? - Yes.

BY LORD CULLEN: Perhaps you could tell us if there are any matters you take issue with because I think perhaps I better know in case I rely on/on something where there is some issue? - I am sorry, sir, I can't recall precisely. I think at one point he talks about semi-wad cut bullet and I don't think he was precisely correct there. I'm afraid, sir, I really would need to review Mr. Paton's evidence in some detail. I did not take notes. I read it.

What I would suggest if there is any passage in it which you would like to draw to my attention you should write to me and draw these points to my attention. I think that would be the sensible way of dealing with it? - Certainly.

And then I will have to make up my mind what to do then.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY: That leads me to the question of illegal firearms. Do you have any information that might assist us in relation to the numbers of firearms which are held illegally in the United Kingdom? - I would like to talk about this. I'm afraid I can't be brief on this subject. One of my jobs involves looking at firearms that come in in amnesties and I think I probably looked at about one-third of the firearms that came in in the previous amnesty. I will be looking at other firearms shortly. I would like just to mention one or two figures. The total of firearms that have come in in amnesty since 1933, and bear in mind that nearly all of these firearms would have been in unlicensed ownership, is 321,023. That includes Scotland. Anecdotal evidence seems to indicate that apart from amnesties the police have recovered approximately 600,000 firearms that have come to the police. So we are looking at a figure of a million firearms or thereabouts that have already come out of Great Britain and nearly all of which would have been unlicensed.

The question then arises about how many more there are out there. That is difficult. Now, can I say to you that I believe essentially one is looking at three different pools of firearms in Great Britain. Pool one we have been discussing today. They are the certified legally owned firearms and the person who owns these is an active shooter. He wants to be able to travel with his firearms, to replace them, to buy ammunition and so on. There is a second, and I submit very small, pool which is used for professional criminal purposes./ purposes. My own feeling is that they can probably be served by 2,000, 3,000 or 4,000 firearms. If you look at the report that was done by Oxford University recently on the use of firearms in crime, it indicated that most of these cost less than £200. In a magazine article, a magazine called SKY written shortly after the 1988 Firearms Act gave anecdotal evidence that the only firearms purchased illegally that cost more than their equivalent purchase legally were Uzi sub-machineguns and other weapons that were popular in the drugs sub-culture. The indication there is that supply exceeds demand for serious criminal purposes.

The third pool of firearms, and that is the one we are talking about at the moment, is those that are in public possession, members of the public, but uncertificated. Now, you may wish to consider the extent to which those can be and have been recovered.

Again, I would like to take you back to the period before firearms licensing in any serious way was introduced in this country which was in 1920. For all practical purposes before 1920 anyone could buy pretty much any sort of firearm they wished to possess.

Now, with your permission, sir, I would like to read from a short passage from the Journal of Beatrix Potter which is dated 13th January, 1885. "I can't help thinking that the state of society, as regards personal safety, has rather gone back lately. A correspondent of the Times in Paris states that he became confused as to his overcoat in the lobby of one of the most influential and respectable Paris Clubs. He thought that he should at once recover his coat because he had left a revolver in the pocket, but he felt in no less than 20, in every one of which was a pistol. This letter called forth a most startling one from a gentleman who seemed veracious, and must of course have given proof of his good faith to the editor.

He said he had been staying at a quiet Yorkshire hotel when, one day in the coffee room, a discussion arose as to whether the practice of carrying revolvers is common in England. The correspondent thought not, but to his amazement discovered that, out of the eight or nine persons present, he was the only one unarmed. The Times wrote a Leader on the subject, in surprise and consternation, and other papers declared that the practice had for some time been very common, and it is/

is perfectly well known to the authorities.

One of its dangers, a shocking example, has lately occurred in Huddersfield, where an unfortunate gentleman thinking he heard burglars in the middle of the night, went downstairs and shot his cook dead."

Now, that indicates that firearm possession was extremely common and also that it was not very responsible. I would just like to make an aside that in this country things have changed very considerably obviously and one factor of that is that possession of firearms in this country now legally is a very social activity. If you shoot game you are normally shooting on someone's land and you shoot as a member of a group or a syndicate which tends to be self-regulating. If you shoot in clubs you are in a self-regulating society. So in fact it is in the interests of all shooters to make sure that reasonable standards are attained for safe and successful firearms use and handling which is a significant change but my main point is the very large number of firearms we see.

Another point which indicates this is that the Americans passed a major tariff law change in 1897 which put a very heavy tax on cheap firearms coming into America. The result was that Great Britain, who through Birmingham, who was a major firearms manufacturer, also at that time became the single perhaps destination of firearms from Belgium which was probably the largest firearms manufacturer in Europe at that time. So all one can say is that there were very large numbers of firearms in Britain after the First World War.

The/

The second main source of illegal firearms are wars and other forms of conflict. The First and Second World Wars brought huge numbers of firearms into the country. In fact it was not illegal in the First World War. After the First World War the Government gave great quantities of rifles and machine guns, which were not deactivated, to people and institutions who contributed to War Savings.

In the Second World War it was technically illegal, but you only have to look at the number of firearms used in crime which emanated from that source to know how many were brought back.

Since 1945 there has been no great cessation of conflict in which Britain has been involved, albeit in a very minor way. You only have to look at the Falklands and the Gulf War and all the weapons that were brought back into the country illegally and which have been involved in crime.

In relation to the amnesty figures, they appear to be going up somewhat. There could be lots of reasons for this. The big amnesty after the Second World War in England and Wales netted 76,000 firearms, 70,000 in 1961, 41,000 in 1965, 25,000 in 1968, 42,725 in 1988; so the numbers have not obviously been decreasing.

All one can say is that there are probably still large numbers of firearms out there, illegally held. My personal gut feeling and belief is that it is probably around the million mark.

Figures have been put by others ranging from many thousands to 4 million. I would think around 1 million is a sustainable figure.

There are a number of quite distinct issues I wish to ask you about finally. We have heard about the practicability of converting weapons from multi-shot to single shot, and all that evidence concentrated on weapons made of standard material, which I presume is normally iron or steel of some kind? - That is correct.

No attention was paid at that stage to the possibility of weapons which have frames made of different/different material. Now, how widespread are weapons with frames of different material? - Aluminium started to be used as a frame-making material significant between the wars, and became much more common post-war. There are quite a large range of pistols which have aluminium frames, which are not susceptible to welding.

Yes? - There is also an increasing tendency to use plastic as a material. Quite apart from lightness, it has very genuine benefits in that it won't corrode, and it helps to avoid recoil.

Now, there are a number of pistols, including the Glock, which is commonly used and also commonly used as a police weapon, and that has a plastic frame.

In top competitions, at the top level there are a number of weapons made by Sterr Tripp, which have plastic frames.

There are of course a number of adhesives. You can hold aircraft wings on by adhesive these days. Plastic however by its nature is fairly soft, so I suspect it would be relatively easy to cut out blocks.

The general tenor of the evidence was that it would be largely unsatisfactory to try to convert these weapons from multi-shot to single shot because of the potential for re-constituting the original mechanism. Is the position the same in relation to those weapons which are plastic framed and alloy framed? - Yes.

We have also had some evidence -- this is on a separate matter -- about the speed at which a good shot might fire off a number of rounds from a single shot handgun? - Yes.

You may have read that evidence, given by Mr. Paton?
- Yes, I did.

Do you agree with the view he expressed about the time he said it would take to re-load and fire a second shot? - No, I think the time he indicated was too long.

Why is that? - A single shot weapon is normally very simple to manipulate. Most of them are/are very similar to a conventional shotgun, in that the barrel will drop and the fired case will be ejected.

Now, provided you have ready access to additional rounds you can re-load quite quickly.

I used to use a .22 shot, single shot, for vermin destruction, and I used a wrist bandolier which had .22 cartridges to assist re-loading. With one of these attached to your wrist, the movement from cartridge to breech is four or five inches, and you can considerably speed up re-loading. If you couldn't buy one of these it is within anyone's capabilities to make one.

How quickly could you re-load and fire? - I would suggest with reasonable practice you could get it down to about five seconds.

Can you tell me anything at all -- please tell me if this is outwith your expertise -- about the relative lethal capacity of .22 rimfire ammunition compared to centrefire 9mm ammunition? - You have to understand that there is a difference between lethality and stopping power. Something can be lethal without immediately incapacitating someone. Heavy handgun cartridges are designed for immediate incapacity. A .22 long rifle is capable of lethality on a human being and is capable of instant lethality if you hit certain areas, the brain and the spinal column.

This might seem commonsense, but is it not the case that the bigger the round the more likely it is to cause damage? - It may cause damage, but it depends where you hit. If you hit the brain or the spinal cord with a .22 you will cause instant death. You would not cause as much damage generally to the brain with a .22 as you would with a heavy calibre weapon.

But you must be more likely to hit a vital organ the larger the calibre of ammunition? The smaller the calibre the greater or more likely must be the chance that you would miss? - That is true. The chest cavity however is full of vital organs. If you miss one you are likely to hit another.

We/

We have had some evidence in this case about Hamilton's firearm certificate containing permissions which were never taken up over a number of years, in fact up to 10 years? - Yes.

In your experience is this something which does occur from time to time? - I suspect it occurs frequently. For instance, on the renewal form used by the Metropolitan Police, it takes this into account.

Yes? - On my own firearms certificate I have had one open variation on my certificate for a long time. Now, my interest is antiquarian, but I have an open variation, which is an opportunity to purchase. It is not a problem.

BY LORD CULLEN: How detailed is that variation? - In my case it is for a .455 revolver. Normally the variation is couched in terms of nominal calibre of weapon. I am talking about -- I think it was a .445 handgun. Essentially it is not specific as to serial number or.....

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY: So you would have the facility within that variation to purchase something other than the particular weapon that you sought it for? - Yes. It would still have to be a handgun of a .455 calibre, but frankly that is quite normal for target shooters, who may well decide that they want a .22 rapid fire pistol, and apply for a variation. They will then try several different types and decide which one they want.

BY LORD CULLEN: If I could ask you about one matter, and that is to do with clubs. We have heard a number of clubs are affiliated to national organisations? - Yes.

Does that have any bearing upon the way in which the clubs are run or managed? Are there model rules or things of that sort? - There may well be advice to that effect from the Associations. The Associations also increasingly make available information on safe range construction and on training courses to ensure safe and good practice.

Now, for the most part we have been thinking about what might be called members' clubs, but I think there are a certain number of what might be/be called proprietary clubs, which may be more common in England than in Scotland. How many are there relative to members' clubs? - I don't know, and I am not sure anybody does. They are normally approved clubs, because they will be wishing to attract new novice shooters to join. Now, the fact they are commercial is not necessarily a bad reflection on them: indeed it has been argued that a properly run commercial club, where there is the ability to pay staff full-time, may run better and more efficiently than clubs run by amateur committees. There is therefore in my view nothing wrong in a club being commercial. The way they operate tends to be that they will operate a shooting range, to which a shop will be attached, and you may buy your ammunition or firearms or shooting equipment there: so obviously the commercial aspect will stem not only from membership fees and range fees on the day but also from the sale of necessities for the sport.

Are they likely to be affiliated to national organisations or not? - They may be, yes. In practice, in operation they can be, the same as an amateur-run club. The difference is that they are run with a bottom line that is a commercial one.

Are they linked normally to somebody for example who may be a dealer? - Yes, normally if they were going to sell guns and ammunition, in these circumstances they would have to have a dealer's certificate, because they would be doing it by way of trade or business. An amateur-run club can sell its members ammunition through its firearms certificate.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY:

Arising out of that last matter, I assume it would be possible to invite the Home Office to provide information in regard to the number of clubs which are approved? - Given the nature of the approval today, it would be straightforward for them to secure that information in the future, because approval now requires a positive police inspection to make sure the club is meeting the criteria. In the past approval was essentially a correspondence transaction, and lasted indefinitely; approval is now a finite concept.

JOHN/

JOHN ANDERSON (Recalled)

The witness was reminded he was still on oath.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY: I believe that at one stage in your service with Central Scotland Police you served in the Child Protection Unit or the Family Unit? - That is correct.

When was that? - I began in the Child Protection Unit on the 4th January, 1989 at the launch of the Unit.

How long did you remain in the Unit? - I remained there as a Detective Sergeant until April of 1991, when I was promoted to Inspector.

Who took over from you? - Detective Sergeant Paul Hughes took over at that time.

Did you keep in touch with matters within the Family Unit? - For the following year not directly. I did obviously see Detective Sergeant Paul Hughes in my working day.

While you were in the Family Unit did you have any experience of Thomas Hamilton? - I did not, sir.

After you left the Family Unit did you pick up information from other sources about Thomas Hamilton? - I did.

From where? - From Paul Hughes, who in casual conversation asked me if I had known Thomas Hamilton. I said no, and he mentioned he had an investigation ongoing at that time and I said I had no knowledge of him.

When was that? - It was during the time I was away from the Unit, which would have been after 1991. I could not be more accurate than that.

What was the investigation he had ongoing at that time? - I believe it concentrated on the area of Loch Lomond.

Was that the first you had ever heard of Hamilton?/

Hamilton? - It was to my knowledge, yes.

Now, in April of 1995 WPC Anne Anderson spoke to you about Hamilton? - That is correct.

Now, that was specifically her subject, Hamilton? - Yes, sir.

Do you remember the conversation in some detail? - It was a very short conversation: but yes, I can recall.

Do you remember why she spoke to you? - Yes, sir.

Why was that? - She came into my office at Stirling and mentioned that she was doing background enquiries into a Thomas Hamilton; I think it was to do with a firearms enquiry. Whether it was an application or a renewal I do not know.

Yes? - She said she had checked to see if he had any previous convictions, and he had not. She suspected I may have knowledge of Thomas Hamilton.

Did she indicate why she thought you would know? - She did not.

What did you say? - I recalled the name Thomas Hamilton in my previous conversation with Paul Hughes, and I mentioned to her that Thomas Hamilton had been the subject of investigation by the Family Unit, and I suggested she make enquiries with staff there and also carry out a check on the Force's Criminal Intelligence Unit to see if they had information regarding Thomas Hamilton.

She indicated in her evidence you told her the Family Unit had put in a report regarding Thomas Hamilton? - I am aware the Family Unit did put in reports to the Procurator-Fiscal.

Do you remember telling Constable Anderson that? - No. My recollection of the conversation was that I said Thomas Hamilton was the subject of investigation by the Family Unit, and that she should liaise with them.

Do you remember saying to her that there were no previous convictions that you knew of? - No, sir, she told me that she had carried out a check and found that he had no previous convictions.

She indicated to us that you told her there were no previous convictions and there was nothing we, that is the police, can do about that? - No, sir, that is not the case.

Are you suggesting her recollection is faulty? - I would say that if the officer had said that, she is mistaken.

This whole investigation made a big impression on her, which she told the Inquiry very graphically about, and one might have formed the impression that she was likely to remember clearly what had gone on. Do you think it may be your recollection that is not clear now, since it wasn't so important to you? - All I can say is, sir, that my recollection of events as far as I am concerned are quite accurate. The conversation we had was very short and perhaps no more than a minute, and I am quite satisfied that I can recall what I said and what indeed that officer said to me.

No cross-examination.

MR. BONOMY: Sir, the arrangement I have made with Professor Cooke is that he should come this afternoon to respect his professional commitments, and I would be grateful if you could now adjourn. It is proposed that Mr. Lake should take his evidence.

LORD CULLEN: 2 o'clock -- would that be helpful?

MR. BONOMY: I think because the length of his evidence is rather unpredictable, it might be as well to start at 10 to 2.

LORD CULLEN: Very well -- 10 to 2.

After/

1.50 p.m.

After an adjournment for lunch.

LORD CULLEN: Now, Mr. Lake, I think there was a suggestion about a witness being interposed?

MR. LAKE: Yes, the next witness it is proposed to call is Mr. Joseph Jackson and it is proposed that Mr. Campbell examine him.

LORD CULLEN: Yes, all right.

JOSEPH JACKSON (56) Sworn

EXAMINED BY MR. CAMPBELL: I think you currently live in Jackton by Eaglesham? - Yes.

Are you a retired Detective Superintendent of Strathclyde Police? - I am.

What is your current occupation? - I am chief of security for the Chivas Glenlivet Seagram Group in Scotland.

I think you joined the City of Glasgow Police Force in 1960? - That is correct.

How many years of police service did you have? - Just over 32. 32½ years.

And you have prepared a statement which I think has been given to all parties and to the Tribunal and we can take your personal details in the main from that. Am I right in thinking that in 1978 you became a Detective Inspector and you were transferred to the Gorbals Sub-Division of F Division of the City of Glasgow Police? - That is correct, yes.

And at that time as a senior CID officer did you begin to take charge of a number of major inquiries, including murder inquiries and numerous other types of violent crime? - Yes, I did. Before that I had been a Detective Sergeant in the Serious Crime Squad and of course was dealing with serious crime but had not actually fronted any enquiries or headed any enquiries.

I/

I think you served in the Gorbals area in that capacity for some seven years before being promoted in 1985 to Detective Chief Inspector of the Strathclyde Serious Crime Squad? - That is correct.

Seven months later you were again promoted and appointed Detective Superintendent in charge of that Department? - That is correct.

And you remained there for a further two years before transferring to G Division to take command of the CID within that Division? - Yes.

And you served there for five years before retiring from the Strathclyde Force? - That is correct.

Were you an authorised firearms officer? - Yes, I was.

Was that from 1974 until your retirement? - Yes.

And can you give us some indication of the kind of experience which you have had which enables you to tell us a little bit about the illegal obtaining of firearms which is the specific subject that I wish to ask you about? - Obviously as a CID officer, and I was always in the CID from three and a half years service, when dealing with criminals and the criminal fraternity, the majority of the time was in Glasgow but when Strathclyde came about it was outwith Glasgow too and from there of course we had to deal with situations where there were robberies which involved firearms, murders which involved firearms and other types of crimes where firearms could or would have been used or would be in the possession of the criminal who intended to commit that crime.

As an incidental, do I correctly understand that as a Detective Superintendent you were also involved in a Working Party concerning the restructuring of the use of firearms by Strathclyde Police officers? - That is correct.

And the recommendations of that Working Party were implemented in due course? - That is correct.

Obviously/

Obviously you are aware of the terrible crimes committed by Thomas Hamilton on the 13th of March of this year? - Yes, I am.

With which we are concerned. The Inquiry has heard evidence to the effect that if Hamilton's firearms certificate had been revoked Hamilton may have simply obtained firearms illegally for the purposes of carrying out these terrible events? - Yes.

And it is in that context that I want to ask for you evidence. We have also been told that Mr. Hamilton had no criminal record? - Yes.

He had no previous convictions of any nature. Bearing that in mind, do you have any comment to make upon the proposition that Hamilton would have obtained firearms illegally? - It is something obviously you would have to think about and you would have to think well, in that context from where could he obtain firearms? If you are looking at it from the criminal element, if his certificate or firearms certificate had been revoked and he had obtained them from the criminal element -- looking at Hamilton's background I would suggest that this would be highly improbable for the simple reason that, and I think great stress has been placed on the fact, he had no criminal convictions and he had no criminal contacts. To obtain firearms from criminals in the context which I am aware of, on many occasions for armed robberies etc. firearms are hired out. Firearms are there for hire and I couldn't see Hamilton being the type of person who could go into an area, and there are specific areas, where these firearms can be hired. I could never see Hamilton going into such an area to hire a firearm or buy a firearm for that matter. I just don't think he was that type of person.

Now, those of us who know very little about this type of thing may not immediately understand why Mr. Hamilton should not have been the kind of person who would be able to do this. Can you help us on the reasons for your view? - Yes. He doesn't have the criminal contacts, he doesn't have the type of background, he has no previous convictions and he doesn't seem to come from any criminal family. He doesn't seem to come from an area where firearms could be obtained in that way. There/

There are a whole set of circumstances which would have to be put together before I would say that Hamilton or any other person could go to an area and obtain firearms by buying from criminals or hiring them from criminals.

So do I understand from that it is not the simple matter of anyone with the necessary amount of money going to wherever one goes and buying an illegal firearm or hiring an illegal firearm? - No, that is not the way it is done.

Now, have you considered other possibilities such as burglary? - Yes. I have thought of the situation where if he had no firearms and he was requiring to acquire similar types of firearm which Hamilton had he would have to look at specific places where he could go to obtain them by housebreaking and it would have to be a gun club or it would be a firearms dealer. These places generally, if they are holding firearms, are heavily alarmed and heavily secured and it certainly takes a certain amount of expertise to break into such places. I would suggest that Hamilton would know this and possibly not have the nerve, let alone the expertise, to carry out such a housebreaking.

So from the knowledge which you have of Thomas Hamilton's background and the type of person which he was, assuming his firearms licence had been revoked what is your view as to the likelihood of him obtaining alternative firearms by illegal means? - The only other way that he could obtain them by illegal means was perhaps by some colleague or contemporary within a gun club giving him these guns but from my reading of Hamilton, Hamilton was a loner, Hamilton was not a person who had friends and if a person's firearms certificate or gun licence was revoked I would expect that people who were members of the gun club certainly would not be prepared to hand over other firearms to him so I really don't think.....it is not beyond the bounds of possibility but I certainly do not think it is probable that Hamilton could have obtained the type of firearms he had if they had been taken from him. If his legal firearms had been taken from him I don't see him acquiring illegal firearms.

CROSS/

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. TAYLOR: Can you tell the Inquiry the nature of the information you were given which enabled you to form your view of Mr. Hamilton? - The information I was given certainly was in regard to what evidence of.....you are talking of my view of Hamilton, sir?

How it was formed, the basis upon which it was formed? - Obviously I am the same as every other person. I have been reading the papers. I have been looking at the background of Hamilton.

Sorry, looking at the background? Can you please tell me the source for the background material? - The source for the background material is material which has been published in the newspapers and the media which has come from this Inquiry.

So your view of Hamilton has been formed from the media? - My view of Hamilton has been formed from what I have read of him and of this Inquiry.

Have you had access to the transcripts of the evidence? - No.

Have you had access to any of the statements which were prepared by the witnesses before they gave their evidence? - No.

Have you had access to any of the Productions? - No.

Have you formed a view that Mr. Hamilton was a determined man? - Yes, I have formed that view. I have formed a view from what I have read. I have formed a view that he would be obsessive in certain areas. When I speak of that I would be speaking of the fact of how he pursued the situation with regards to the childrens Clubs that he was involved in.

I take it from what you have said about knowledge that weapons capable of doing that which Hamilton did on the 13th would be available to certain individuals from various sources in Scotland illegally? - Can I say that my experience is that generally illegal weapons which are used in robberies or murders and which I have come across and/and which I have investigated are generally sawn-off shotguns. It is very rare to find 9 mm Browning automatics or semi-automatics being used by criminals. I have had instances where semi-automatic firearms have been used but the vast majority of times when I have investigated crimes it has been sawn-off shotguns.

If one wanted to obtain a 9 mm weapon or similar and if one was sufficiently determined, would it not be possible by building up certain relationships to be able to gain access to such a weapon, albeit it illegally? - I don't know which types of relationships you would be referring to. Can I say to you that generally when criminals are trying to hire or buy a gun they will not refer to "I want a 9 mm Browning automatic". They will take whatever is going. If it so happens the cache of guns has sawn-off shotguns or some other type, they will take that. I have never known a situation where they have been able to go and demand a certain type or calibre of gun.

Even if one accepts that, would you accept that it would not just be one particular type or calibre of gun which would be necessary to do what was done on the 13th? - Yes, I would accept that. I would say, though, that semi-automatic firearms to my own personal knowledge are highly dangerous and these are the ones which really people are afraid of because even in a situation where I have recovered a semi-automatic firearm at one time, it was still a situation which although I was an authorised firearms officer and I had actually taken the magazine from the gun, there was still a bullet within the chamber so these are guns which are very, very dangerous and semi-automatics always were ones which were treated with extreme caution. If we were going into a situation in the serious crime squad where we had to face firearms and our information was that this was the type of weapon which was being used then obviously that was the time when we took great care.

Are you familiar with the Bonnyrigg murder? - No.

I can understand why one might have some difficulty if one walked into a locality without being known and made inquiry as to whether it would be/

be possible to obtain a weapon illegally, either by purchase or hire, but would you accept that it is said that there are certain premises, usually pubs in Glasgow, in certain areas in Glasgow and perhaps in Scotland, where one can go and where a weapon can be obtained? - Yes, but you can't just go in with some money in your hand and go to the barman and say "I'd like to buy a rifle" the same as you say "I would like to buy a bottle of beer". It isn't done that way.

You would need to establish a relationship? - It would take a long time to establish such a relationship. Believe me, with the criminal fraternity in Glasgow you couldn't do it in a week. It is a thing that would take a long, a long time and you would have to be introduced and you would have to know other criminals and they would have to take you into their particular enclave before you could ever get anywhere near buying a firearm.

Are you saying that would be impossible to achieve? - I would say it would be highly improbable that any one of Hamilton's calibre could go into the areas of Glasgow which I know, and very well, and buy a firearm.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. LAKE: You said that in your experience most of the guns used in crimes are sawn-off shotguns? - That is correct.

Is it the case that most of the illegal firearms you come across are ones that have already been used in the course of some crime? - They may have been. Most of the time, yes, when we investigate crime we would find a firearm which had been used. There are other occasions of course where we were given information and you would go to certain premises and you would recover firearms. Shotguns, it is very difficult to work back from a shotgun whether or not it had been used at that time.

If you are given information about the existence of firearms without a certificate, is that a matter which you investigate at once? - Yes.

So although estimates may be given it would be very difficult for the police to predict with/with accuracy how many unlicensed firearms are in circulation? - In my experience, yes, that is correct.

And my understanding is that evidence was given this morning that there were up to one million in circulation. Would you be able to make any comment on that? - No, I couldn't make any comment on that.

Similarly, would you be able to make any comment on how many of the weapons used in the course of crime are licensed or unlicensed? - The vast majority of them have been firearms which have been obtained illegally. Generally with shotguns, they are guns which have been stolen during the course of housebreaking etc.

When you say the vast majority, are you able to make any estimate on percentage? - I'm sorry, I couldn't. If you allow me to speculate in this instance, in my experience, because I have had instances where you had firearms dealers broken into etc. and guns acquired from there but I would say that in all crimes which I dealt with and all the firearms I saw, I would say probably 5 per cent at the outside would be legal firearms.

RE-EXAMINED BY MR. CAMPBELL: You were asked certain questions by Mr. Taylor about the material upon which your evidence was based? - Yes.

Were you provided by a solicitor acting for the families with summaries of the evidence of this Inquiry? - I was with some of them, yes. Yes, it was summaries I was given. I wasn't given statements.

And I think we know there are large files upon files of Productions just outside here? - Yes.

Were you provided with summaries by the same solicitors of the chapters of evidence in the Productions? - Yes.

And did you read that material? - Yes, I did.

Did/

Did you take it into account when preparing your evidence? - Yes.

DAVID JOHN COOKE (43) Sworn:

EXAMINED BY MR. LAKE: What is your present occupation? - I am a Clinical Psychologist and Professor of Forensic Psychology.

Where are you a professor of psychology? - At Glasgow Caledonian University.

What are your qualifications? - Bachelor of Science, Master of Science, Doctor of Philosophy, a Fellow of the British Psychological Society and a Chartered Clinical and Chartered Forensic Psychologist.

Can I ask you to have in front of you please the reports that you have prepared for this Inquiry. I propose that these be numbered 64 and 65. 64 would be the one entitled "Predicting Violent Behaviour: A Psychological Perspective" and 65 would be the one entitled "Psychological Report on Thomas Watt Hamilton". Are these the reports prepared by you? - Yes, they are.

Rather than referring you to the reports in any detail, what I would like to do is to consider certain aspects arising out of them which I might add would involve dealing with them perhaps not in the same sequence as they are contained in the report? - Okay.

The first thing I would like to consider please is different types of violent behaviour and if I can ask you to look at Page 15 of the first of those reports entitled "Predicting Violent Behaviour"? - Indeed.

I think we see under a heading on that page you refer to the fact that the nature of violent acts and violent individuals is heterogeneous? - That is correct.

In what way do you mean it is heterogeneous? - In the sense that people really are/are violent for a whole variety of reasons. Some people can be violent because they are active criminals using violence in an instrumental manner to intimidate other people or to rob a bank. Other people use violence because they are emotionally disturbed, perhaps even brain damaged. Other people use it because they have difficulty controlling their anger. A whole variety of reasons why people actually act in a violent way and you can get to that violent act by many different pathways.

And do these different pathways reflect different states of mind of the person that commits a violent act? - Yes, indeed. If we take a case of instrumental violence, a person might not be in any emotionally aroused state. They are using violence as a tool whereas someone else may be using violence because they are very angry, they feel they are being threatened. The cause of emotional reasons are instrumental reasons.

Now, I take it that these different types of violence are more or less prevalent depending on the population as a whole? - Yes, indeed. It varies. There are some sub-cultures where violence is the norm. It is the way of dealing with difficulties and people are brought up and taught that violence is the way to resolve difficulties.

Is there a particular sort of violence that will arise in that context? - The end result, the violent behaviour, will be same but it comes because people have learned that is the way to deal with difficulties and we call that sub-cultural violence.

The particular incident which occurred at Dunblane Primary School on the 13th March of this year, how would you classify that particular form of violence? - I define it as spree killing or mass murder and these terms are used but they are not clearly defined. The difference. I am not clear what the motivation for it was. It may be that he had violent fantasies that he was acting out because he felt he had a grudge against people because they were spreading rumours about him but it isn't clear.

When you talk about the violence as being/being a spree killing then would there be factors which are to some extent a definable profile of factors which might be relevant to it? - No, there may be a variety of reasons why people commit spree killing.

It may be that someone is suffering from psychotic symptoms, they believe God has instructed them to carry out a violent act. That may be one process leading to it.

Even/

Even within the different parties there may be a great variety of factors which go to explain why violence might occur? - The internal psychological processes which lead to the same end result may be different in different cases.

I would like you now to look at page 16 of your report, to consider the determinants of violent behaviour. What are the two basic determinants which go towards violent behaviour? - There are psychological factors and there are situational factors.

Although we will consider this in more detail, in broad terms what are the psychological factors? - Something inherent to the person. It may be they have personality difficulties that make them prone to anger easily, they may be dis-inhibited through the use of drugs or alcohol, they may have psychotic symptoms. It is the type of thing which is inherent to the individual.

Just in very broad terms, what are situational factors? - These are the factors within the context of the acts of violence which may increase the likelihood of violence. One example might be of a fight in a pub, if someone draws a weapon the likelihood of the violence being more extreme is increased. Researches show that victims who had to draw a weapon were more likely to be killed by the perpetrator than those who did not. So there is a psychological factor in the violence.

In what way do these two factors inter-act to provide a determinant indicator of violence? - It would vary. In some cases the psychological factors on their own may be sufficient. For example, there may be someone who has elaborate sadistic fantasies, and these are enough to make him go outside, seek a victim and to resort to violence without any other external trigger, where there are others where the situational factors would be very important.

If someone goes into a public house wearing a football jersey they may be attacked because of what they are wearing and the context in which they are wearing it.

Turning now to consider the various factors/factors which might be relevant to predict violence, I think you summarised those, starting at page 6 of that report? - Yes.

And again we have a sub-division into biographical factors on the one hand and psychological factors on the other hand? - Yes.

What is the definition of the two categories in this case? - I was trying to simplify the list. Biographical factors would be characteristics of individuals, the experience and the employment status, and they would include gender and age, because young men are more violent than older women, for example.

And psychological factors? - Psychological factors which are inherent to the person or things to do with their thoughts and behaviour.

I think under the heading of "Biographical Factors" you say "The best predictor of future behaviour is past behaviour"? - Yes.

Then you talk about being a victim or witness of family violence on a child, recent relationship problems and recent employment difficulties? - Yes.

What is the relevance of these factors in indicating that someone might be prone to committing violent acts? - You are looking for a variety of factors which are related to violence. There is no simple relationship between the number of factors someone shows and the risk of violence: one is sufficient. For example, if someone has this belief that God is telling him to go and kill prostitutes, that might be sufficient to make him a high risk. In general terms, the more risk factors the greater the risk.

Talking about someone who thinks God is telling him to do things, that would be a psychological factor? - Yes.

In relation to purely biographical factors, do these factors give any indication about the state of mind of a person, or are they matters of statistical probability? - I think they are all interlinked./

interlinked. They are based on essentially the actuarial risk. These things have been shown from studies to be linked. People with unstable employment are shown to have a high rate of violence. That may be linked to personality or other factors. One could not be clear on this.

So biographical factors may overlap the psychological factors? - Yes.

Looking at psychological factors, which you begin on page 8 of your report, you begin with a number of headings, the first of which is "Personality Disorders"? - Yes.

What is meant by a personality disorder? - This is essentially a disorder which starts early in adulthood or late adolescence, and it affects all parts of a person's life. They have difficulty in dealing with problems: they demonstrate inflexibility, and so forth. It should be distinguished I think from other forms of mental disorder, which tend to be episodic. It is a thing which is persistent and affects all aspects of an individual's life.

You provide instances of three different types of personality disorder, the first of which is psychopathic personality disorder? - That is correct.

What is suffered by someone who has a psychopathic personality disorder? - There are a variety of problems that will show up that are relating to that or they are relating to -- they tend to be grandiose or egocentric, forceful, cold-hearted and so forth. Their actions are labile, they are easily angered, they are impulsive and sensation-seeking in their behaviour. These lead to increased risk of criminal behaviour in general and violent behaviour in particular.

By what means has it been established that there is an increased risk of violent behaviour in people with psychotic personalities? - There are now a number of extensive studies looking both retrospectively and prospectively at individuals. One example is a study where people are rated before they leave prison and are followed up ten years afterwards, and you can say that the probability of them/them having resorted to violence is five or six times increased when they have high levels of psychotic disorder. That has been replicated in nine or ten studies now.

The next one you have referred to is sadistic personality disorder? - Yes.

What are the key features of that? - When an individual relates to other people in a cruel and demeaning and often aggressive manner they may get pleasure from humiliating or assaulting other people.

One of the characteristics which has been shown to be a frequent part of this is a fascination with violence, a fascination with weapons and Martial Arts, with tortur, concentration camps and that type of thing.

When you say weapons and Martial Arts, is that purely the activities themselves or is it films also? - Books, pictures, photographs, films, video tapes.

I think sexual sadism is a sub-category of sadistic personality disorder, is it? - That is not clear. It is related in some way, but it is not necessarily a sub-category. I think it probably is a sub-category, but it is not clear.

What are the features of sexual sadism? - Again, it is not very well mapped out.

There are a few research papers on this, and the evidence suggests that they get sexual satisfaction from dominating other people and humiliating other people. They have elaborate fantasy lives, which are often more important to them than their real lives. They have fantasies of domination of others.

They may attempt to get sexual arousal by putting their sexual fantasies into action and indulging in behavioural draw-outs: so they may stalk someone for a while and get sexual gratification from that, but that fades after a while, and that is not sufficient, and they go further and perhaps assault them.

On page 24 you list previous reports of a classical/classical description of a sadistic murder and of that sort of personality trait. What sort of personality trait did these people have? - They are shy, socially withdrawn and often prudish, though they have complex sexual fantasies. Although they are sexually interested they are often inexperienced in sexual matters.

I think you go on to refer to the relevance of weapons? - Brittain was a psychiatrist and pathologist who wrote the classic account of sadistic murderers. He was able to look at a crime scene and also talk to the perpetrators because of his dual speciality. He suggested "The weapons have an attraction for him far beyond what they have for an ordinary collector, and he may 'love' them, handling, and in the case of firearms dismantling them and cleaning them for long periods of time. He has strong feelings about them, may have special favourites and he can even have 'pet' names for these."

That has been taken from a report in 1970 I see? - Yes.

Is that still accepted to be an accurate definition of that? - There has not been a lot of research in that areas. Britain's account is a clinical account based on clinical experience. There have been two major papers since this that perhaps have clarified the mechanisms by which sexual sadism operates. Fortunately it is a rare disorder, so it is difficult to get an absolutely clear profile of what they are like. It is perhaps the best clinical description we have had at the present time.

You state there it is a rare disorder. How rare is it in relation to a general situational personality disorder or psychopathic personality disorder? - We can't answer that, because we have not got studies we have carried out on the general population.

Within the Scottish prison system the rate of psychotic personality disorder is probably in the order of 8 per cent, but we have no estimate of the level of sadistic personality disorder or sexual sadism within the general population: one can only guess.

The/

The next of the psychological factors relates to impulsivity? - Yes.

What are the features of impulsivity? - It can take a variety of forms. People may act without thinking, they may think and make decisions very quickly or they may go through life without any thought for the future.

How does that relate to violent conduct? - People attacked without thinking can be violent. In a dispute or a conflict rather than reflecting how to deal with it the person will punch or kick or act in a violent manner.

Next you refer to poor anger control? - Yes.

What are the principal features of that? - There are certain individuals who might be described as hot-headed, who in a social situation would feel they were being provoked, seeing injustice where there was no injustice, easily aroused physically about these issues.

If someone does have poor anger control what is the mechanism by which that leads him to commit violence? - It is a way of trying to resolve the problem by treating it and trying to stop the problem happening. It is a way of getting over their frustration.

The next heading is "History of Substance Abuse". What range of substances do you include within that? - The principal one would be alcohol, but there are other drugs which are related to violence; Temazepam abuse, for example.

In relation to someone who only consumes alcohol, in what circumstances does that become relevant to violent behaviour? - I suppose people are dis-inhibited and are less likely to think about the consequences of their actions.

With other substances violence may occur because people are trying to secure supplies of the substance, although that could apply to alcohol as well.

Is alcohol relevant in any situation where it/it is consumed or only in situations where it is being consumed in an abusive manner? - I think at even low levels of consumption it can be sufficient to facilitate violence. In public houses, someone taking two pints of beer may be sufficient if the other triggers are there, may be sufficient for him to be violent.

That is the dis-inhibiting effect you have referred to? -
Yes: depending on their experience of drinking alcohol, their weight, etc.

We have heard some evidence to the effect the police take into account when issuing a Firearms Licence the fact that a person has been convicted of driving whilst under the influence of alcohol. Is that a factor which in your view would be relevant in relation to predicting the possibility of someone committing violence? - Yes, it suggests the person is prepared to behave in a reckless manner, and that would be an increased risk.

The next heading is "Recent Suicidal and Homicidal Thoughts and Intent"? - Yes.

How does this relate to the issue of violence? -
Someone who has formed an idea they are going to kill someone else, that increases the risk.

Again we don't know how common this is in the general population, for people to have homicidal ideas and not to carry them out. We know that suicidal thoughts are not uncommon in people who do not go further.

Would suicidal thoughts be an indicator of likely violence to others? - They can do, yes.

The next heading is "Psychotic Symptoms or Manic Symptoms"? - Yes.

What do you mean by "Psychotic Symptoms"? - Psychotic disorders such as schizophrenia may include difficulties in perception or difficulties in thinking, but they may include delusions, hallucinations and so forth.

What is meant by "manic symptoms"? - Manic symptoms would be symptoms of a manic depressive/depressive disorder, which might include thinking difficulties, irritability and so forth.

You said in relation to personality disorder that these are matters that set in relatively early in a person's life and last throughout their life? - Yes.

Is that true of psychotic symptoms or manic symptoms?
- Generally psychotic symptoms start -- they may start in early adulthood, and they are episodic. When the person is not in an episode of their illness they are effectively in a normal state. There is a quantitative difference in their state when they move in and out of the illness.

Yes? - With a personality disorder it is a basic disorder which is there all the time and may diminish in late adulthood, and you may find anti-social personality disorder diminishes in people in their 50's, but it is a very long-lasting process.

If someone has a psychotic disorder but is not having an episode of it would there be any indication that they were prone to having episodes in the future? - There might be slight evidence in their mannerisms and behaviour and so forth, but not in the same way as a personality disorder is evidenced throughout a person's life.

Does that mean it would be more difficult to detect a psychotic disorder? - When a person is not in a florid state, yes.

In what circumstances might a person be detected having a psychotic disorder? - You mean in terms of the symptoms?

Yes? - If they start believing that God has instructed them to do something, or if they say they are hearing voices which are giving instructions or if their thinking seems abnormal in its form and structure.

How would you as a psychologist be able to detect if a person was suffering from these symptoms? - Only by interviewing them, and if they were in a hospital by observation of nursing staff, who/who would be able to see them talking to someone who was not there, for example.

We will come back to this in more detail, but purely in relation to some of the psychotic symptoms, if they did not wish to reveal them to you would you have any means of discovering they were there? - It would be difficult to detect active symptoms such as delusions and hallucinations. It may be their behaviour seems odd, but it would be difficult to be precise about the diagnosis in the absence of information from them.

You have referred to the prevalence or non-prevalence of personality disorders. How prevalent are psychotic symptoms in relation to personality disorders? - We have more information in relation to the prevalence of psychotic disorder in the general population, which is estimated at between 1 and 2 per cent of the general population, and a similar prevalence within the prison population in Scotland.

Is that 1 or 2 per cent of people who are currently in an episode of psychotic disorder? - No, that is a lifetime prevalence for them.

How relevant is psychotic symptoms or disorder to violence? - That has been a hotly debated issue over the years. In the public mind there is an association between what we might term madness and violence. However, empirical evidence is not clear. There is some evidence that types of psychotic symptoms, so-called poor control of anger, are linked to increased characteristics of violence.

I quote a paper by Monahan, who is regarded as the world authority on this topic, which asserts that psychotic symptoms are really of limited relevance as compared to other risk factors, like abuse of drugs and alcohol.

Is/

2.40 p.m.

Is that because these other factors are more prevalent in the population, or are they more potent in relation to causing violence? - Both, I would think.

You mentioned there threat control over-ride systems; what are they? - These are symptoms where a person believes that an outside agent has taken control over them, and believes that they have been subjected to some sort of threat, and the outside agent is instructing them to deal with this threat in some way, so someone may believe that the police are going to shoot them, and this voice is telling them that the police are going to shoot them and you must do something about it to protect yourself.

And how would that come to light? - Only if the person reported that by detailed interview, and it may not come to light.

And just prior to the reference to threat control over-ride symptoms, you refer to "urrent psychotic symptoms are lined with an elevated short-term risk for a violent act"? - Yes; we are thinking in terms of months rather than any longer -- about two months maybe.

From what time does that two months run? - From the onset of the symptomatology.

Is that each episode of symptomatology? - Yes; one cannot be precise about these things. The evidence comes from only two studies essentially. It is not well worked out yet.

I have asked you about the prevalence of psychotic symptoms and personality disorders, but in relation to impulsivity, poor anger control, substance abuse, and suicidal and homicidal thoughts, are they more prevalent than these other disorders? - I would consider they probably are, but we don't have any clear evidence of the prevalence of these types of psychological characteristics in the general population at the moment, although there is a large community study which is about to report next week, which are using many of the instruments that I would use in measuring/measuring these things, and it will give us estimates, but it is a North American study, so it may not relate to Scotland, but it will give us some estimate of the prevalence of these characteristics in the population.

Is that the general population? - The general population -- a community study.

And the bases for the current studies have begun? - Which studies?

A number of studies; you said you don't have information on these matters in the population as a whole. On what base of the population do you have information regarding these matters? - The bulk of the information will come from studies in special hospitals, studies in prison settings, and studies in forensic clinics. Very few studies have been carried out in the general population because for one reason, the base rate or frequency of the violence we are interested in is so small that you would need to have very large samples to study the problems.

And presumably the base rate is much higher within hospitals? - Within special hospitals and within prisons.

I would like now to consider means by which these various items might be detected and violence predicted, and to consider the tests that might be used? - Yes.

And the results which might be identified, but dealing with those in reverse order and first of all looking at the issue of results, what is the outcome of any test as to someone's psychological state? What information can you get out of that in the context of risk assessment? - Yes -- you can use the information in a variety of ways, but one of the common ways is looking at a group of people and looking at a group of people and looking at whether they are likely to offend or likely not to offend in the future.

How might you test someone to discover the existence of the disorders you refer to? - If I can say normal risk assessment is carried out in the context of a hospital or prison or forensic setting and/and so normally you have a lot of information about an individual, either from previous case records or from observations by nurses or by prison staff, and then the person doing the assessment would carry out a very detailed interview with the individual, and that may include -- for serious cases, that might be quite a number of interviews, which may be 10 or 12 interviews over a period of some time. To assess the risk, you might use standardised interviews to look at things like psychotic symptoms and so forth. To assess other characteristics such as psychopathy, you would use the instrument of choice, which is the psychopathy check-list, which is a standardised instrument for measuring psychotic personality disorder.

What is the check-list? - Essentially a psychopathy check-list revised, which is the one we would use in the criminal population or hospital population and has 20 characteristics, and the assessor will make judgements on 20 characteristics using information culled from files and also from the interview with individuals, so we would be looking for things like grandiosity, impulsivity, criminal flexibility, someone who engages in a lot of criminal activities. You would be looking for lack of empathy, failure to take responsibility for their actions and so forth, so these are all very tightly defined, and there are standard ways of rating it, and once you get a score, that can indicate the level of risk the person may present.

You said it is part of the information provided by an interview? - That is correct. It is not essential, but to make the ratings, you must have access to collateral information, because pathological lying is a defining feature, so you have to check out the information and it can be done from collateral information or file information alone, but it is preferable to do it from interview.

You have said that once that information has been gathered, it would be assessed by the person carrying out the valuation? - Yes.

Using the guide you have referred to? - Yes indeed.

To what extent is that evaluation a subjective evaluation or to what extent is it governed/governed by an objective scale? - It is governed by an objective scale. Each item or each characteristic is defined in rather tedious detail and examples given, and the person doing it has to be trained of course by somebody experienced in these matters. Training takes three or four days to learn how to do the test properly, so it is not subjective.

Prior to the training, does the person require to have any qualifications before carrying out such an assessment? - Yes, he would need to be clinically qualified either as a psychiatrist or a psychologist.

But he would need further training over and above that?
- Yes, very specific training on this particular instrument.

The phrase has come up a number of times "psychometric testing"? - Yes.

Is what you have described psychometric testing? - It is one form of psychometric testing.

What other forms of psychometric testing are there? - Psychometric testing is essentially a way of measuring psychological characteristics or abilities or perhaps people's personality characteristics, and they can take a variety of forms. They can be demonstrated by a psychologist who asks the person to do particular tasks. The fundamental characteristic of psychometric assessment is that the tasks are done in a standard way so everyone gets the test in the same way, that they are scored in a standard way so you know -- there are criteria laid down for the scoring of each item in the test, whatever the test is, and there are statistical methods for converting a person's performance and scores into a score which can convert to how a large group of people have performed. Perhaps the easiest example would be a IQ test where a person is given a large number of different types of tests which are related to intellectual functioning, and then that is converted to the IQ score and you can tell whether the person is in the bottom 10 per cent of the population in terms of intelligence, the top 10 per cent and so forth.

Is/

Is a IQ test a form of psychometric test? - It is a form of psychometric test.

I think you mentioned in your report on page 24 in the form of paper or administered by computerised adaptive testing? - Yes. Essentially that is a method of delivering a psychological test using a computer screen. The particular advantage of this method is that instead of perhaps administering 100 questions or tasks to measure their ability, the computer is able to select items as the person goes along, which are likely to be measuring the level of ability that the person is falling into. I am not sure if that clarifies it, but shall I give you an example?

Yes, please? - If you are measuring an arithmetic ability, the computer will give the person one or two items to begin with, and from that, whether they pass or fail on that gives you an idea of the range within which their ability lies, and then it will select tests which measure that rate of ability, and administers those to the person, so it is an efficient way of selecting items.

Are there any disadvantages to using computers to carry out this sort of test? - They are very useful for measuring abilities, but for measuring aspects of personality which are related to risk, they would not be very useful, but if you consider that personality disorder is important, then the computer has no way of judging people's inter-personal style or the way you relate to other people and so forth, so it wouldn't be very useful in this sense.

And how do you get that information? - By interviewing them.

What sort of things would you be looking for in an interview of the person? - I would be interested in whether they showed any appropriate sign of remorse, not just for their criminal behaviour, but for the way they relate to other people, or their behaviour to their family and so forth, whether they seem to have the capacity to experience appropriate emotion, or whether the emotion is seen in an alien concept to them. That is a concept of a psychopathic individual.

How/

How long would it take in duration to carry out an assessment of a person to determine these criteria? - Which criteria?

All of the things you have talked about? - It is difficult to do it in two days of working with the individual and scoring subsequent to that.

You think two days? - Two days, 16 hours, to do all the things you have talked about in the report.

And is that on a one-to-one basis or would it be possible to assess an entire group of people? - No, it would have to be done on a one-to-one basis, but it could be done with collateral information.

What sort of collateral information? - For psychopathy, previous offending history, you would want to know the way they relate to their family. In a prison setting, you would want to know how they relate to other prisoners and other prison staff and so forth.

In/

3.00 p.m.

In a non-prison setting, a community setting, if you were trying to evaluate people working with children or in possession of firearms what collateral information would you want there? - I would want very detailed references from people who know them well and who took the matter seriously and who could be considered to be reliable. I think that that would be quite difficult to obtain.

BY LORD CULLEN: Is what you are describing a quest which could alter with the passage of time, or would it be very much a lifetime characteristic? - There are some stable characteristics which would tend to be consistent, such as psychopathy, poor anger control. These characteristics do tend to diminish slightly as people get older.

In terms of psychotic symptoms, these may emerge at any time. Someone may develop poor anger control seven months after being processed, and you would have no idea at the time of the assessment he was going to develop these characteristics or symptoms.

What you have been describing sounds as if it would take a lot of time and require a lot of collateral information. Is it practical to think of something along more modest lines for community use which would be affective as a form of screening? - In my view it would not be effective, sir.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. LAKE: I would like you to consider even whether you would consider someone who has been interviewed in a two day test, whether or not that would be effective for determining the propensity to commit violent acts. Do you consider you would be able to identify the likelihood of someone committing a violent act? - Are we talking about the community setting?

Yes? - I think you could identify a propensity in some individuals, and you could estimate generally that they are likely to act violently. There are always of course errors. You either falsely predict that people will commit an act and they do not, or you predict that people will not be violent and they are violent. There is always/always errors in the system.

The other problem is the severity of violence we are trying to predict. Presumably there is a relationship between the frequency and severity of violence. Extreme violence is very rare and is virtually impossible to predict because of what is termed the base rate problem.

What is the base rate problem? - It means it is effectively impossible to predict any behaviour which is rare.

I see? - Violence prediction schemes operate reasonably well in settings of violence which is reasonably common, such as prisons or psychiatric hospitals; but in settings where violence is rare you run into problems of rare events, which are extremely difficult to predict.

It is like trying to predict a disease. It is the same difficulty. There are good statistical reasons for it that I do not feel qualify to explain.

When you refer to the low base rate making prediction difficult, what sort of base rate do you start to have difficulties at? - Below 10 per cent.

And we would consider the chances of committing violent acts as a whole falls beneath that 10 per cent? - Yes, I imagine it must do, in a community setting.

You referred to the output of various heads as being a scoring system? - Yes.

How did you translate that score into an assessment of whether someone is likely to be violent? - There are various ways of doing it, but I put different factors, the different factors we have identified, into a risk system. Some factors are more important than others.

I suppose the most well-worked-out actuarial system was produced in a psychiatric hospital, and in that setting psychiatric personality disorder is the most important predictor of violence. There are other things, such as whether/whether you have parents who are alcoholic, which is one predictor, or the early onset of behavioural problems is another predictor. The people are positive in these characteristics there is a weight given to the characteristics, and there is a continuous score of risk. The higher the score, the greater the risk.

It then becomes a question of judgment about the level of risk, what level of risk is acceptable, and you can change the cut-off risk that is used. If the scale goes from zero to 100, you may decide that a score of 50 or above is sufficient to say there is a risk, or you may say a person has to have a score of 80 or above before they can be regarded as a risk. You choose the cut-off point normally to justify the number of predictor errors you make. You can look at both positive and negative errors and decide where to put your cut-off score.

This is a reference to something which is contained on Page 19 of your report? - Yes.

I think there you provide a simple table which tabulates the prediction of violence against the outcome of violence? - Yes.

And you establish areas where both predictions are correct and you also identify incorrect predictions? - Yes.

I think you refer to a situation where violence predicted does not occur, and that is a false positive? - That is correct.

And in situations where it is predicted that it will not occur but does, it is a false negative? - Yes.

Presumably the allocation of the outcome within these four categories depends on the cut-off point you set on your scale? - That is correct.

I think on the next page, Page 20, you give an example of the same information, but adjusted so that there are not false negatives? - That is correct.

And/

And an increase in false positives? - Yes.

And that is identified simply by a cut-off point on the scale? - Yes.

So presumably it is a matter of evaluation and consideration in relation to any particular matter whether persons were not concerned by false positives than false negatives? - Yes. You have to balance the two types of error. In hospital settings the evidence is that people tend to be conservative and to make more false positives than they ought to, but that is the nature of things; so in that case they are balancing public safety and the liberty of patients, and the information available suggests that people tend to err on the side of false positive predictions.

That is where you are considering the liberty of the individual? - Yes.

So if you did have a concern about the liberty of the individual would you consider that would increase the number of false positives? - It would reduce them.

If you did not have to take into the account the question of personal liberty would that have an effect on the cut-off point you choose in your scale? - If your intention is to use false negatives and you were not worried about false positives then you would suggest a cut-off point.

Do you consider it would be possible to adjust the cut-off point to such an extent as to eliminate false negatives in relation to the possession of guns, firearms? - I don't think you could use psychological assessment with sufficient confidence to eliminate false negative errors.

Why is that? - We don't know enough about all the factors which make people violent. There are situational factors which come into play. People change between assessments in relation to these factors, which makes it difficult to rule out false negatives.

In relation to violent behaviour, which would be the most difficult false negative to eradicate?/

eradicate? - Violent behaviour which was related perhaps to psychotic symptoms which developed after assessment, or violent behaviour related to complex fantasies which the person did not acknowledge when you were interviewing them.

Would you be able to find means in a psychometric testing to calculate information of such a nature to identify people who would be safe to hold firearms? - You could probably do that with some degree of accuracy, but there would still be the danger of error.

Why would that be? - The sort of pattern I showed can be quite useful in identifying a group of individuals who are unlikely to be violent, but you couldn't be absolutely sure that some of them won't be, depending on the circumstances, situations there they are confronted with.

Considering the outcome, that you do not feel confident about predicting violence by means of psychological factors, I would now like to look at the second determinant you referred to, which is the situational factors. I think on Page 17 of your report you refer to the importance of some of these factors in two studies in relation to the availability of handguns? - That is correct.

What is the nature of these two surveys? - They are essentially studies following on -- one was a study following the changes in the law on the availability and transfer and possession of handguns in the District of Columbia in the United States of American; the other was a comparison in the rate of homicide using guns between Seattle and Vancouver.

Do you see there the difference in homicides related purely to handguns, despite the fact the assault rate was similar? - Yes. This is a comparison between Seattle and Vancouver, who are very close to each other, similar population trends, similar demographic characteristics, similar rates of crime: but there was 4.8 times as great a risk of being killed by a handgun in Seattle than Vancouver, and the study suggested this was because of availability.

I think you talk about your work in Barlinnie?/

Barlinnie? - Yes, I worked in the Barlinnie Special Unit for 12 years as a psychologist there.

What does the research from there show? - It shows that a group of very violent men transferred to Unit, and the assault rate on staff and other individuals dropped dramatically. The research shows there was not any intrinsic psychological changes but situational changes.

What were the situational changes? - There were differences in the way in which aggressive behaviour was handled. If people started having arguments then a group meeting was called, and you had to come to these and discuss the difficulties till they were resolved without violence.

Anything else? - They were given more autonomy within the Unit to make basic decisions about the operation of the Unit.

The third thing was that there was a change in the nature of the staff/personnel relationship. An attempt was made to break down the "us" and "them" relationship which persisted in other prison settings to a relationship closer to that of a nurse/patient in a hospital. A variety of factors were important.

Turning/

Turning now to consider what situational controls might be appropriate in relation to firearms, I think you deal with this from page 26 onwards on your report? - Yes.

The first one you referred to is the availability of weapons? - Yes.

I think there are a number of considerations in which you consider that is a factor that is a relevant form of situational control? - Yes.

The first of these is lethality? - Yes.

What is meant by that? - It is the instrumental effect of the weapon. Studies would suggest that people are more likely to be killed by firearms than if a knife is used. This study suggested you are five times more likely to be killed by firearms used than if a knife is used as a weapon.

You then consider the question of restriction of access to handguns? - Yes.

And you refer to the study in relation to the District of Columbia? - Yes.

What was the outcome of that? - Essentially they looked at the in the changes in the rate of homicide using guns before and after the introduction of the laws. They found that the number of homicides and suicides dropped significantly; homicides by firearms dropped significantly, and there was no increase in suicides or homicides using other methods following the change. They also looked at other similar Metropolitan areas closer to the District of Columbia, where there had been no change in the gun laws and no changes had occurred in these areas where the law had not changed.

Yes? - The authors concluded that the restriction had reduced the number of deaths by 47 per year after the law had been implemented.

I think you then go on to consider the other study, being a comparison between Seattle and Vancouver?/

Vancouver? - Yes.

And the fact that the availability of guns in Seattle might account for the very much greater rate of homicides? - Yes.

And you set out the conclusions of the study? - Yes.

At the foot of page 27 you refer to another study relating to Canada which seemed to contradict that? - It was not very well carried out. It was a page and a half paper, and a very limited analysis, I thought. It doesn't completely contradict the first paper.

Are situational controls more relevant to certain types of killings than others? - Yes. I think situational controls would help reduce certain types of murder in society, but there will always be determined perpetrators who will get access to guns whatever we do, so there will always be a core of people who can and will get access to weapons.

Dealing with these categories of possible killings you referred to at the outset of your evidence, people who might be determined would carry out killings anyway, but what other category of killers might not be affected by situational controls? - I suppose people involved in what might be termed professional criminal activities, to do with drugs and so forth, turf wars, etc.

Which category of killers might be more affected by situational controls? - Impulsive individuals. If someone goes into a public house with a handgun they are likely to use it, if the weapon is in their hand. A knife or a tumbler, they might use it, but the lethality of the weapon is much less.

Looking at the case of Hamilton, what is the relevance of situational control to that situation? - Clearly in this case the man had an intense interest in weapons. If he couldn't get them legally he may have been able to get them illegally. Now, that may have been difficult for him if he was not part of the criminal sub-culture. Individuals in the criminal sub-culture I understand can have easy access to weapons, but someone who has no/no contact in that area might have found it more difficult.

We were going to consider Hamilton's situation in particular. Do the various views set out in the first of the two reports -- are they very generally representative of the views within the psychological profession? - In respect of psycho-metric testing I have published articles on this in journals talking about things of this nature.

People who are experts in the field have accepted the argument. I have also received a fairly reasonable grant from the Chief Scientist's Office to research this issue, and am currently doing that. That research appraisal was subjected to peer review before it was funded: so to that extent I think it represents mainstream thinking.

BY LORD CULLEN: You have been talking about various factors that might lead to a person resorting to violence, and you have also been talking about the ways in which one might set about trying to predict that kind of outcome. Now, it has been suggested to me that multiple killings are apparently done by men who mightly loosely be described as loners? - Yes.

The type of person who has had difficulty perhaps in establishing relationships with others, who has a lack of empathy and perhaps low self-esteem? - Yes.

It might be suggested that people like that tend to convert these feelings into some kind of dominating act, ending up in killing? - Yes.

Can you think of any way in which one might target psychometric testing on that sort of person in order to try to weed that person out of the category of those wanting to possess firearms or the like? - I think the first problem is that probably we do not know how many individuals like that are around in the community. The second problem is that we do not know how many of them go on to do these sorts of things, but it is very rare: so even if we did identify this group of individuals and got insight into the thinking, it would be difficult -- we know that there are a lot of people -- certainly I meet a lot of people in my clinic who have homicidal ideas but do not go on to carry out the/

the act, but they have very violently disturbed thoughts of doing things to other people.

Now, sir, we do not know the basis by which people have these thoughts and then translate them into actions. I think it is very difficult to work that out. Also, it seems that the people we are dealing with and trying to assess will not talk to us about their fantasies and feelings and thoughts and anger and so forth. People may do that in the context of treatment over a long period of time, where if they have come to us for another reason we have been able to assist them and they may develop trust and start talking to us about these issues; but my experience is that that takes a long time.

Someone who has got low self-esteem, is a loner, a lack of empathy, is probably someone who is not easy about disclosing his innermost thoughts of violence and fantasies.

So we are talking about a system in which one can make a score? - I do not think that is realistic.

So obviously the system would have to be relatively simple to administer and has to be short circuited by.....? - That is correct.

I/

I tried to indicate that in a setting where we would typically do an assessment which is a very lengthy involved procedure, and part of the length of time is because it takes a long time to build rapport and build trust with the individual being assessed.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. LAKE: If somebody is a loner and lacks empathy, but there is also disquiet in respect of that person amongst people they meet as to their suitability to have weapons or to be dealing with children, would that provide a platform from which you consider you would be able to carry out a psychological assessment with a view to identifying undesirable traits? - Here we have an individual who on the face of it may represent a risk. It depends how much time and effort we direct towards the assessment, and it would have to be very detailed, and we would need to have a lot of collateral information before we could do it adequately.

If I could now turn to the consideration of Hamilton in particular in the second of your two reports, if I can do this in reverse, considering the conclusions of your report first of all, I think you say you do not consider it would be possible to provide a full explanation of the factors which led Hamilton to commit these crimes? - That is correct.

But you give what you consider to be the most likely explanation; what is that? - I think it is informed speculation. It is the most likely explanation from my perspective and my experience, but in this sort of situation one cannot be clear. I think it is the sort of -- the data which are most interesting are missing really, which are data about his thoughts and fantasies, and I think that is probably the most significant aspect, but there is very little evidence to go on in relation to thoughts and fantasies of this man.

But in the absence of these data, what you have described as informed speculation, what conclusions and explanations have you arrived at? - I think primarily he was suffering from some form of personality disorder characterised by lack of empathy, and perhaps by sadistic personality disorder, but there is not complete and sufficient information/information to make an absolute diagnosis of that.

Do you consider that with all the information you now have about Hamilton, that not including the events of the 13th, it would have been possible to identify in advance that he posed a significant risk? - From the information that I have, no, I don't think one could have predicted that he would have been a risk of this sort.

Just picking up the point I dealt with before, had you had information that Hamilton was already the source of a great deal of concern locally, both by Reporters to the Children's Panel and parents, would that have made it any easier for you to carry this out? - In terms of predicting a risk of what type of behaviour?

First of all, what assistance would it be in identifying his unsuitability to have custody of children? - If we had the information which has come to light since the Inquiry started, then that would have been extremely helpful. Looking at his video tapes and so forth, I think it is suggested that he had a strong paedophilia interest.

And in relation to identifying the chances of acts of extreme violence, would that have assisted you? - I doubt it.

If I can turn back in your report to consider a number of factors which you enumerate in your first report as being indicators of possible violent conduct, and you note there was little history of past violent behaviour? - Yes.

You refer to the incidents of which you were aware from the boys' camps? - Yes.

When he struck them sometimes across the head? - Right.

Do you consider that had any relevance in determining likelihood of violence? - It was not clear from the information I had the extent of this violence. Reading it, it struck me that it might have been -- looking at the video tapes and the way in which he ran his clubs, he seemed to be almost in a time warp in terms of the way he behaved to children and the way he ran his gymnastics and so forth, / forth, and it may have been that he considered slapping children about the head or smacking them on the legs as an appropriate way of controlling them, and when I was at school, this was not an uncommon feature in the way we were dealt with.

Would you consider that in the 1980s and 1990s as being an indicator of violent conduct? - Not particularly. I didn't think that the level of violence was severe enough.

I think you then note that there was no specific information as to Hamilton himself being a victim when he was a child of violence? - No.

But you describe it as relevant that he did have relationship difficulties and was a loner? - Yes.

You refer to his employment difficulties, such as they were, and in fact he wasn't employed. In Hamilton's situation, would you have considered that of relevance? - I think of more relevance is the effect of lack of employment, the financial difficulties. He was running up debt and he was being refused loans and he was having financial difficulties.

Then under the heading "Personality disorder", you assess features of Hamilton's personality? - Yes.

And in particular, you refer to psychopathic personality disorder which was considered in the context of your earlier report? - Yes.

Did you consider that there was evidence that Hamilton was suffering from a psychopathic personality disorder? - No. He showed one or two traits, but he didn't have sufficient number to merit a diagnosis of being a psychopath. I used an instrument which is developed for use in community settings for people who have no previous convictions, and he obtained a score of six out of 24 on that. To be diagnosed as a psychopath, you have to have a score of 18 or above, so he was a long way from the diagnostic.....

I think the details of that are at the top/top of page seven of your report? - That is correct, yes.

If the cut-off point is 18? - Yes.

Is it possible to indicate what the average score might be on that scale? - We have no idea in the general population. There is one study currently which has been completed, but has not been reported, in North America where they used this on 1200 people in the community. When that is reported we will have some idea of the average score in the general population, but as yet we have no evidence from the community setting, and certainly nothing in Scotland.

Without knowing what the average is, are you able to say whether, if the level, the cut-off level had been set so as to catch Hamilton with a score of six, what percentage of the population that would have caught? - No. You need to know the prevalence of the disorder or the mean value and standard deviation of the scores in the general population and we don't have that information. We haven't done the studies to collect this data.

When is the study you have referred to to be published? - There is a conference in Oxford next week at which the results of the biggest recent assessment study ever carried out will be presented by Professor Monaghan from Virginia. They have spent six million dollars doing this research in the community identifying what we are trying to do, looking at risk factors of violence.

And that should be available next week? - Yes.

Looking back at page six of your report, you refer to there being no evidence that he was pathologically superficial grandiose or deceitful. What sort of things would you be looking for to give an indication that these factors exist? - Superficial people tend to have the gift of the gab. They tell stories which are elaborate and they lie easily; they are good at conning people. When you are talking to them you get a sensation that they are not being open and truthful although they can be quite engaging to be with. Grandiose people feel they are superior to other people and feel they may have/have special insight into the way the world operates, and they may regard other people as worthless. One patient described them as being like insects which he would like to crack and he could just destroy people.

That is quite an extreme example? - Yes, but that is one example of grandiosity. Deceitful people, perhaps con artists, would be an example of people who lie pathologically in the sense they lie for no reason and they know you are going to catch them out, but they still lie anyway, and when you catch them lying they just smile. There is no embarrassment and they just proceed to tell you more falsehoods.

We have heard evidence from a policeman who considered that he had adjudged Hamilton as being a deceitful person. Is the deceit relevant for this check-list of a very extreme nature, or is every day deceit enough? - It would be extreme deceit. I assume most, if not everyone, lies in certain contexts. Lying in a social context, if you don't want to embarrass someone and tell a white lie, that would not be seen as pathological, but I am talking about lying when there is no purpose and almost for the fun of it. It has been termed "duping delight", getting pleasure in conning other people.

And you have given an example of what you consider to be grandiose conduct which is quite extreme? - Yes.

Would it have to be that extreme to qualify it for the check-list? - Not as extreme as that, but Hamilton was described as timid and withdrawn and overly polite and so forth by various witnesses.

We heard evidence from a surgeon who had met him in the late 70s, who felt that Hamilton had delusions of his own abilities? - Yes. It is difficult from the information available. There seemed to be a group of people who report him as timid and withdrawn loner and unassertive, Dr. Fairgrieve in this context regarding him as grandiose, and it is difficult to make a judgement on whether that applies or not.

You go on to consider in the context of the screening check-list you were referring to, a number of other items you felt Hamilton might satisfy the requirements of the check-list? - Yes.

But you come only to a score of six out of 24? - That is correct, yes.

In the next part of your report, you analyse Hamilton in relation to sadistic personality disorder. What was the outcome of that analysis? - I felt there was some evidence that he may be suffering from a sadistic personality disorder, but I don't feel there is sufficient to be absolutely certain.

What facts did you consider were relevant in identifying him as suffering this disorder? - Looking at the video tapes suggested he might have pleasure dominating other people, younger boys between 8 and 12.

It/

3.40 p.m.

It looks like he was taking photographs and video tapes presumably to look at later, and the children seemed to be suffering; they seemed to be cowed and distressed when they were doing certain of the exercises, sit-ups, working on the wall bars and so forth. I read there was an education expert who suggested he is pushing the boys far too hard, but I felt that may be to do with power and control, although one cannot be certain about that.

You referred to a number of other matters in relation to threats? - Yes, it seems he may have gained pleasure from alarming others. It is reported he deliberately alarmed his biological mother by telling her she would have to go to Inverness for medical treatment; he fired a gun at James Gillespie. His neighbours felt he deliberately frightened her by creeping up behind her. It was stated he was being cruel to the boys.

The final matter you mention under that heading is Hamilton's fascination with weapons? - Yes.

Despite all these factors you do not consider there is a clear indicator he suffered this disorder? - No. Under the diagnostic system which is used, which is the DSM3R system, there has to be clear evidence of four of seven characteristics. I could not be absolutely clear that he had so sufficient interest in the suffering of others to be absolutely sure. There is suggested evidence to that effect, but I was not absolutely certain.

Again, if all this information had been available to you prior to March 13th you would not have been able to identify him as being someone who suffered from this disorder? - If this information on its own had been available, no. If I had been able to talk to him that would have been perhaps different.

I see? - A lot of the risk factors are to do with the way the person relates. You have to make judgements about how they seem to be experiencing emotion, etc. If you think someone does not seem to have the capacity to feel guilt, empathy and so forth that is important. It is difficult/difficult to gauge that from the sort of information which was available.

Would this information be enough to ring alarm bells and suggest that further enquiry was needed? - Yes, in terms of either access to handguns or to children's organisations, yes.

What sort of information would you require to complete your assessment if you had been carrying it out prior to March? - If I had been allowed to interview him that would help; that would be the most important aspect.

If the interview was held under some compulsion, where Hamilton had been forced to attend, would that have assisted you? - It could have. Often we are assessing people either for the Courts or for the Parole Board, and it can be helpful, but again it has got to be seen in the context of a large amount of collateral information and the interviews.

What is collateral information? - Information about their past behaviour, information from people who knew them well. Most interviews are in the context of a prison or hospital, so there would be observations made of the person over a lengthy period of time, and his home background reports and so forth.

Again assuming alarm bells had been rung for someone interviewing Hamilton, would they have needed collateral information to make sense of that interview? - Yes: in the sense that the person may tell you things and you want to be able to check them out to get an idea if they are really a pathological liar and they are trying to con. you. Psychotics will take in even experienced interviewers, so you may be able to check it out.

What things do you require to check out? - As I was saying, in the normal context we have Social Enquiry Reports, background reports and so forth, and observations made by prison staff.

On page 10 of your report you refer to the frequency of Hamilton's visits to gun clubs and his use of specially marked targets and his firing more bullets than he was supposed to? - Yes.

How/

How much weight would you attach to these matters in providing an indication of a disorder? _ In retrospect, are we saying?

Firstly in retrospect? - In retrospect it would be consistent with the notion that he had fantasies which he was trying out, behavioural try-outs. Now, if you observed that at the time it would be difficult to regard it as particularly significant in the absence of any information about what he was thinking in his head, what his fantasies were.

But would that have started additional alarm bells ringing for you? - In which situation are we?

Without knowledge of what happened in March, would the fact he was going to the gun club and behaving in this fashion be an indication of concern in relation to him, or would it not have been relevant? - It might have increased my concern, but only marginally, because he was pursuing a role in a gun club. He was instructed to fire off six bullets over a certain period, and he was firing off the magazine as fast as he could.

You go on to refer to other factors from your other report, and you say that there is no evidence to suggest Hamilton tied in with these particular factors? - That is correct.

You say "In relation to standard risk factors it is clear that many of the most frequent risk factors would not have been present in Thomas Hamilton"? - Yes.

What are the most frequent risk factors? - Capacity for violence, abuse of alcohol and drugs, psychotic personality disorder.

What is the significance of the fact these were not present? - In what sense?

What significance would you attach to the fact these were not present in terms of evaluating the likelihood of his future conduct? - As I indicated initially, there is no clear relationship between the number of risk factors and the level of risk. One risk factor was sufficient. The fact that/that these -- an assessor coming in and looking at probably would not have regarded him as being of high risk, assuming they did not have information about his thought processes.

You indicated at the foot of page 11 that Hamilton may have "Obtained feelings of power and mastery by fantasising his revenge on those whom he perceived as persecuting him"? - Yes.

We have heard some evidence as to the persons or organisations that Hamilton considered were persecuting him. We have not heard evidence that Hamilton regarded himself as being persecuted by children. Is there any way you can indicate as to how his desire for revenge appears to have been directed at children, ultimately? - Well, I understand that he believed that the school at Dunblane and the staff were telling the families not to send children to his boys' club, that he felt the parents were spreading rumours that he was a pervert. Perhaps the most powerful way of getting back at people like that is to kill their children. That is a very traumatic thing to happen. Perhaps he thought he would make maximum impact by doing that. Again, that is speculation.

Moving away from the issue of violence towards the issue of Hamilton's paedophilia, were you able to draw any conclusion as to the likelihood of paedophilic tendencies in relation to Hamilton? - I think on balance there is probably some good evidence that he had paedophilic interests. Paedophilia can take a variety of forms; it doesn't necessarily involve physical sexual contact between the adult and the child. It may be someone has an infatuation with children and likes being in their company, and although physically attracted does not go as far as physical contact.

Yes? - One witness, Carruthers, reported that Hamilton rubbed the inside of his leg, and became "stroppy" when Carruthers moved away.

Yes? - Looking at the video tapes, they give the impression of being fantasy material. He had a lot of them. They were all tapes of boys he was filming. There were long, lingering shots of boys' torsos, and there were lots of shots of boys in a similar position, hanging from wallbars with their/their torsos stretched out, and on some occasions with matching swimming trunks; apparently his favourites received red rather than black trunks. That looked like a fetishistic interest in boys.

How was that fetishistic interest indicated? - We know paedophiles often use films and video tapes, and they use them in a fantasy style which gets them sexually aroused, and they tend to, I suppose as other people do, they have particular physical types that they find attractive, and they tend to select images which are attractive.

Yes? - Some paedophiles find that more mature boys with hair and so on are unattractive, and so they tend to focus on a particular type of body shape and style.

Yes? - One cannot be absolutely sure it was used for paedophiliac interests, but it had that feel about it.

We have heard evidence that Hamilton wanted to recruit boys between the ages of 8 and 12. Is there any significance to be attached to that? - Often paedophiles, whether they are interested in females or males, are interested in sexually immature children rather than sexually mature children. It may be to do with sexual maturity.

Were you able to form a view as to which particular types of paedophilia Hamilton might have fallen into? - There doesn't seem to be a lot of evidence of physical contact, although it may be that the physical training was an excuse to allow him to have legitimate physical contact with the children, lifting them on to the wallbars or holding them while they were doing sit-ups. Yesterday I believe it was alleged he sexually assaulted a boy at camp, but I was only given that information this morning.

Does that affect the conclusions of your report? - It depends on veracity of the witness. If what he says is true it obviously increases the probability considerably.

I concentrated initially on asking you questions about the ability to predict violent behaviour in future, and we have looked at various factors/factors which would be relevant in identifying the violent behaviour in advance? - Yes.

I think your conclusion is that it would not be possible accurately to determine violent behaviour in advance? - Yes, in this context.

Would it be possible to identify the possibility of paedophilic behaviour in advance by means of psychometric testing? - No. One of the characteristics of paedophiles is that they will deny sexual interest. Even those who are convicted and come for treatment, a lot of the initial stages of treatment is getting them to admit what has happened: they either minimise or deny completely.

Yes? - There are techniques which are not psychometric which have been shown to be useful, but they are very intrusive. They involve measuring changes in penile volume or circumference, where people are shown particular types of slide. That technique is used with serious sex offenders in special hospitals before their release.

Yes? - Some of those factors I talked about earlier have been shown to be powerful predictors of re-offending in a sexual manner. This is a very intrusive technique, and it would probably be difficult to do in a community setting.

Is there any factor which might be used to identify in a community setting that someone might be a danger to children? - The experimental work, which has shown promise, again is looking at really pornographic imagery, and looking at viewing times, how long a person takes when they are viewing the images, but again that is not well defined: penile measures are well established, and especially hard to fake, and have been shown to be useful towards prediction of serious sex offenders.

Presumably of course the number of people who carry out this is very small indeed? - Yes.

Perhaps I can consider one other means by which it has been suggested it might be suitable to determine personality types. Have you had any experience of graphology? - No.

Are you able to express any views on the possibility/possibility of identifying personality traits by means of graphology? - I think it is improbable that it would be of use in predicting violence.

Dealing with the precise situation of Hamilton, we heard in evidence that a number of concerns arose in relation to him, both of cruelty and neglect of children, requiring boys to train in swimming trunks, taking photographs of them and taking videos of them, and showing weapons to them. There had been a number of parental complaints? - Yes.

With that information, would you have been able to make enquiries about Hamilton which would have enabled you to draw a conclusion as to his fitness to hold a firearms certificate? - I think it would be difficult. It is difficult to see the link between paedophilic interests and violence. In fact paedophiles as a whole tend to be non-violent. The fact that he had these other interests would not necessarily be any indication of a propensity to be violent with firearms.

But you had an indication from Gillespie of him having paedophilic tendencies? - Well, that would certainly raise concerns.

CROSS/

4.00 p.m.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. CAMPBELL: Will you turn to your first report please? Towards the latter part of this report you are dealing with the availability of weapons? - Yes.

If I have followed this correctly, the available evidence indicates that homicide, gun homicide and gun suicide, or the rate of that, I should say, is linked to the availability of weapons in the particular society concerned? - Yes, that is my understanding of the research in the United States.

And interestingly, in that connection, there is no displacement effect? - Yes.

In the sense that there is no compensating alternative method of suicide or violence to replace the lack of the gun? - Yes, that is correct.

So it follows, if the evidence is correct, that one way of reducing gun homicide and gun suicide in a society is to reduce the availability of firearms? - That is correct, yes.

Looking at your conclusions at page 29, in the third conclusion you say "Restriction of access to handguns is more likely to have an impact on the level of lethal violence in the community; unfortunately, it is unlikely that any restrictions could prevent a determined perpetrator obtaining access to a handgun"? - Yes.

The latter part of that third conclusion, lest there be any confusion or uncertainty over what you say there, I take it that that is not intended to dilute what we would otherwise conclude from the statistics we have just been talking about? - No, it doesn't. Overall the effect of restriction is to reduce the overall rate of gun homicide, but if someone is absolutely determined there is always ways of getting guns in most societies, I would imagine. The number of illegally held handguns is allegedly quite high and so it would be relatively easy for somebody who is very determined to obtain one.

I just wanted to be clear about that, because I think, just speaking generally, comments such/such as that are sometimes used by those who favour the status quo for no change? - No, it's not in any sense trying to limit the impact of the research evidence which shows there is a dramatic change in the rate of gun homicides.

Turning to your second report, can you help me with this -- what was it that you were setting out to do when compiling this report? - Essentially I was trying to see if there was anything that could be identified which would assist us understanding what had happened on that day. I didn't feel I could provide a complete explanation, but maybe some of the facts which led Hamilton down this path might be identified, and I was aware it can only be regarded as hopefully slightly informed speculation after the fact. That is obviously all it can be.

Essentially, am I right that one of the things you were looking at was whether the awful events of 13th March could or should have been predicted by someone such as yourself? - Yes.

If involved in the kind of testing which you have been talking about? - I'm not sure if that is the case because I think the conclusion of my first report is that it is extremely difficult to predict the type of violent behaviour. If there had been evidence of some of the risk factors, then that might have given us a clearer explanation for what had happened. If for example there had been evidence that he was suffering from some psychotic delusion, that might have helped us understand how the events came to pass, but as that wasn't the case, then the report was less helpful in that sense.

You were not asked in preparing this report, and you haven't in your report dealt with the question of whether or not Hamilton, before 13th of March was a fit person to be entrusted with firearms? - No, I haven't dealt with that.

And you haven't addressed yourself to the question whether it could have been determined that he was an unfit person to be entrusted with firearms? - No, I haven't directed my report at that issue.

If/

If we look for a moment at the final conclusion of your second report at page 14, you say "It is unlikely that psychological psychiatric examination prior to the incident at Dunblane would have alerted an assessor to his dangerousness; it is unlikely that he would have divulged any plans or fantasies, unless he had been in long-term treatment". Just concentrating on the first of those for a moment, "It is unlikely that psychological or psychiatric examination prior to the incident at Dunblane would have alerted an assessor to his dangerousness", can you help me with this -- how is that to be understood in the light of your evidence to my learned friend a moment or two ago that what was known about, or at least what was brought to your attention about Hamilton, relating to his conduct before the 13th of March, was enough to ring alarm bells was the way you put it, either regarding handguns or children's organisations? - If I remember my evidence correctly, I thought I said in relation to the paedophilia it would have raised concern. With handguns, the evidence available would have been less use in predicting the fact that he was going to go on and engage in very violent behaviour. It would raise concerns about the paedophilia or attempted paedophilia.

I don't want to enter into a confrontation with you, but I have a clear note that you said this would be enough to ring alarm bells either regarding handguns or children's organisations. Have I noted that wrong? - Perhaps I didn't explain myself correctly. Handguns -- well, in terms of going and engaging in the violence that he engaged in, it would have raised alarm bells, but the probability of that act would probably be quite low because it is an infrequent act. Paedophilia, there would be alarm bells because there is more evidence related to paedophilic interests than there is into gross violent behaviour.

So are we to understand that while alarm bells might be ringing relating to handguns, because something like the 13th of March is a very rare event, then one cannot really predict that it would happen? - That's right, and that comes back to the base rate problem, the difficulty predicting events.

But if alarm bells are ringing about handguns, might not that suggest to people that there is a risk that that person is not fit to be entrusted with weapons? - Are we not talking about two different things here?

Are we? If somebody of your experience, qualification, has alarm bells ringing in his head about a person and handguns, is that not good reason to question his fitness to be entrusted with weapons? - Yes, I think so. I think it comes back to what I am saying in No. 5. I meant his dangerousness in relation to committing the violent acts he committed in Dunblane. I think it is very difficult to -- I think it comes back to the confidence of the assessor. I would be more confident that, on the information I have, that he would be a risk of engaging in paedophiliac behaviour than I would be confident that he was going to go out and shoot people, and that is to do with confidence on the information available.

But if someone such as yourself has any concern at all that someone who has firearms is someone who might act violently, then would you not agree that the public may have a legitimate expectation that if that matter came to light, that something would be done to remove weapons from that person? - Yes, I think that would be a legitimate thing for them to expect to happen.

Because tragically, it may be too late to wait for the absolute confidence that you have just mentioned a moment ago? - Yes.

If I have followed the thrust of at least part of your evidence correctly, you are of course severely hampered by the fact that Hamilton is now dead? - Yes.

And that you are looking at necessarily part of the overall picture as has been made available to you? - And I think significant data are missing in terms of his thoughts and fantasies. That is the most likely explanation, but again I may be wrong.

And the reality is that if the matter had been brought to your attention, specifically in the context of Hamilton, not only would you have wanted/wanted to interview Hamilton perhaps more than once, you would have instigated no doubt other enquiries? - Yes, indeed.

And what the end result of that might have been, we can only speculate upon now? - That is correct.

But what you can say now is, as we find at Page 11, that "He suffered from significant features of personality disorder of a sadistic type"? - Yes, that is correct.

And that he was a paedophile, or at least someone with paedophile tendencies? - Yes, that is correct.

And just in the context of paedophile tendencies alone, the question of whether or not someone of that character should be entrusted with firearms is a matter that legislation has entrusted to the discretion of the Chief Officer of Police? - I didn't..... yes.

So it may be unfair to ask you your opinion on that? - Yes.

And would I be right in thinking that before you were content to express a view as to whether or not Hamilton was or was not a fit person to be entrusted with weapons, you would want to have as clear a picture as possible as to all the available information relating to him? - That is correct, yes.

And for example, you have not been provided with a detailed and comprehensive report of all the information available to Central Scotland Police? - No, I have not, no.

Stop me if this is beyond your expertise, but while no doubt you are right to say that tragedies such as Dunblane are rare events, they have happened from time to time world-wide? - They have indeed, yes.

We have had two for example this year? - Yes -- three.

Is there a general pattern emerging as to/

to the type of person who tends to do this, for example the word loner or mis-fit often seems to crop up in this context? - There is some evidence that that is the case, but that applies to many types of criminal behaviour. On its own, it's not sufficient to tell us very much. Some of the acts seem to be committed by people who are psychotic and others are people with grudges. There are a variety of motivations, in a sense, because fortunately they are rare events and it is difficult to see patterns.

One striking, what some may think is a striking feature of the evidence at this Inquiry is that almost everyone who had anything to do with Hamilton seems to have recoiled from him in some way -- not everyone, but many people? - Yes, many people.

And nouns such as weirdo, mis-fit, loner, creep, that kind of thing, are very common? - Yes.

The Inquiry was adjourned until tomorrow.

TWENTY-THIRD DAY.

LORD CULLEN: Well, let's resume. Now, Mr. Campbell?

MR. CAMPBELL: Thank you, sir. Good morning, Mr. Cooke.

MR. COOKE: Good morning.

DAVID JOHN COOKE,

CROSS-EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. CAMPBELL:
Professor, I want to move away for a moment at least from Hamilton as a specific case? - Indeed.

To discuss matters in a more general nature with you. Your first report deals in general with the question of the extent to which qualified people such as yourself can predict violent acts by people? - Yes.

Am I correct in understanding that there is considerable literature which indicates that mental health professionals are unlikely to be able to predict dangerousness in every case? - That is correct, yes.

Although, is it also fair to say that some of those interested in this field are more pessimistic than others who perhaps take a slightly more optimistic view to the possibilities? - I think that is true, but I think the research is suggesting with the correct techniques we can always improve, but there is always a barrier beyond which you cannot go.

Would it be accurate to say that when professional people such as yourself are dealing with a specific individual, the emphasis is upon management rather than prediction? - Yes, there are/

are two elements; risk assessment entails prediction, but if you are, say, suggesting release of a prisoner on parole and you think there is a potential for danger, you build in treatment and management in the Community.

And that would involve for example, if we discuss someone who is or has been in a psychiatric clinic, then their illness and their history will be well known? - That is correct, yes.

And it will be managed by a multi-disciplinary team?
- In the ideal world they will have, yes.

And tell me if it is just the ideal world, but usually at least, would there be features such as monitoring of the individual?
- Yes.

Discussion with him and between the team managing his.....? - Yes, there would be regular contact with the patient and monitoring of the individual and his symptoms.

And from time to time, positive intervention by perhaps hospitalisation, medication, discussion with relatives and so on? - Indeed.

The purpose of it being hopefully to head off or prevent crises and problems? - That is correct, yes.

So in so far as there may be a predictive element to the management of the patient, no doubt amongst other things that would be based upon the in-gathering of a large amount of information about that person? - You require information, a large amount, yes.

And hopefully a good working relationship between the doctor and his patient? - That is correct.

And again, preferably, would I be right, short time spells between one appointment and the next? - Indeed.

I think you touched upon in your report the question of the extent to which predictive assessment/assessment can be carried out by self-assessment by the individual himself? - Yes.

Would I be correct in understanding that there are very serious limitations about the use of questionnaires and the like? - Definitely; certainly that is my opinion. Many of the characteristics we are interested in cannot be measured reliably using self-report measures.

Not only do they rely upon the accuracy of the responses? - Yes.

Necessarily they involve a pre-determined set of questions rather than perhaps one which would arise if one was speaking to the person? - That is correct, yes.

Also, they omit observer judgment? - Yes, which is critical.

And again, by their very nature, do not permit the therapeutic or management intervention, or may not do so? - May not do so, but often these are used as part of a screen before you engage in more detailed interview of the individuals, but one has to make judgments about the reliability in each individual case.

So in the context of firearms licensing, you perhaps would not be an advocate of psychometric self-assessment? - Certainly not.

Am I correct in understanding from your evidence and from what we have heard from others, that so far as mental illness or a change from a peaceful to a violent person is concerned, this can happen in unforeseen and unexpected ways, sometimes over a relatively short period of time? - That is possible, even whether there is mental illness involved or not, I think.

And of course, peoples own domestic situation may change quite dramatically over short periods of time? - Yes, and that can cause an increased risk of future violence.

And I take it depressive illnesses and the like can come on almost at any time over a short period of time? - Some illnesses can on-set rapidly, / rapidly, yes.

So a firearm in one individual's hands today may be satisfactory, but next year the position may be very different? - That is correct, yes,

Which in itself may give rise to concerns if firearms licence holders are reviewed only every five years? - That is correct.

But it follows from what you have been saying, even a reversion back to the old system of three years, or perhaps even yearly reviews, nonetheless would not necessarily identify the problems we have just been discussing? - I would agree with that, yes.

Stop me if this is outwith your area, but in general terms, would I be correct in understanding that many deaths from firearms include suicides? - I wouldn't claim to be an expert on that.

But it is presumably common knowledge that a proportion of suicides have been committed by firearms? - Yes, indeed.

So any improvement of controls on firearms, in addition to perhaps having an effect on gun homicide, may also have some knock-on effect on suicide rates? - Potentially there is some evidence in the studies I quoted which suggested that may be the case.

Am I correct in understanding that fortunately very few suicides are also what is known as an extended suicide or someone who takes other individuals lives along with his own? - Yes, that does occur, but again I am not an expert in that particular field.

So as to whether Hamilton fell into that category, that is not a matter for you? - No, but I should say that suicide following murder is not an unknown phenomenon. There is literature on that.

afterwards? - Yes.

As to which category Hamilton fell, that is not something that you have applied your mind to? - I would speculate that he formed the intention before he killed the other people, and that is purely speculation.

Based upon what? - Primarily the fact that he changed weapons before killing himself, which seems ritualistic in some way, but it is speculation.

I won't press you on that because I think another professional may touch upon that, but thank you for your comments; so one conclusion we may draw, that might be drawn from your evidence is that psychological assessment is not a complete answer to any public concern following upon Dunblane? - Yes, I would agree with that.

Therefore, if that public concern is to be addressed, one needs to consider other methods of control? - Indeed.

With regard to your first report, in that context one alternative method of control which you point to is situational control? - That is correct.

The most obvious of which, if I have followed you correctly, is the restriction of the availability of lethal weapons? - Yes, indeed.

Can I ask you to turn to Page 22 of the first report please? Is that a passage in your report headed "Not all errors are equal"? - Yes.

You tell us that "The available evidence suggests that mental health professionals are conservative and tend to recommend the detention of patients who in actuality have a low likelihood of violent recidivisms"? - That is correct.

"That is, mental health professionals tend to make 'false positive' errors rather than 'false negative' errors"? - Indeed.

Could that be described as, for obvious reasons, a safety first philosophy? - That is correct, / correct, yes.

You go on "In the context of a secure psychiatric facility a high 'false positive' rate has to be carefully monitored as significant issues are at stake; the decision must balance the liberty of the patient with the protection of the public"? - Yes.

You go on "In the current context, where decisions may have to be taken regarding access to handguns or access to children's activities, judgments about acceptable errors may be easier to make. In this case public safety is not being balanced by the unreasonable detention of an individual in a secure facility, but merely by the removal of the opportunity to engage in interests, namely shooting or running children's organisations. If screening is introduced it should be designed to have a low 'false negative' error rate even, as is inevitable, this is at the cost of a high 'false positive' rate"? - Indeed.

Do I correctly understand that as a recommendation that in this particular context, the philosophy should be safety first? - Absolutely.

So that is both in the context of running children's organisations and firearms licensing? - Indeed.

And would I be correct in assuming that safety first philosophy should apply to the general regime of firearms licensing and also to dealing with a specific individual? - Could you clarify the question for me? I am not absolutely sure what you are asking?

I will take it out and start again -- a safety first philosophy may have effect in considering what the overall regime of firearms licensing ought to be? - Yes.

Would that be an appropriate approach? - In my opinion it would be, yes.

Similarly, once a firearms licensing regime is in place, it requires to be implemented or enforced in a particular individual's case. Would the same safety first philosophy apply? - Very much/much so, yes.

So would that suggest that in the context of a specific case -- I am not meaning to talk about Hamilton particularly -- but just generally, there may be considerable benefit if those involved are alert to any personality trait or characteristic that might be a cause for concern? - Yes indeed, it would be helpful.

And putting the matter at the very minimum perhaps, it may at least suggest the need for further careful consideration and investigational examination? - Yes, other examinations.

Your report dealing with Hamilton himself, while subject to the various caviats which you have made very clear, you appear to have reasonable confidence that he did demonstrate paedophile tendencies? - Yes indeed.

Bearing/

Bearing that in mind, could we look at page 16 of your report, the more general report? - Yes.

In the middle of that page you have a little diagram overlapping some ellipses; psychological factors in one ellipse, situational factors in the other, then an overlap headed "Violence"? - Yes.

One situational factor I take it we will have in mind in the generality is whether or not the individual has ready access to weapons? - That is correct.

Let us assume for the moment that so far as psychological factors are concerned that individual is a paedophile or has paedophilic tendencies? - Yes.

Let us also assume that he runs boys' clubs and let us assume those boys' clubs have given rise to numerous complaints by parents and others in society? - Yes.

Might that give rise to other relevant situational factors in relation to paedophilia or in relation to violence?

I am thinking primarily in terms of risk of violence. Is it possible for example that a parent outraged by what has happened confronts Hamilton? - Yes, and that might escalate into violence.

If the paedophile is confronted by an outraged parent and the paedophile has ready access to firearms, that is a situational factor which one requires to bear in mind? - Yes.

So it is perhaps not possible to put paedophilia into a separate category from any concern over violence where there is ready access to weapons? - Yes. As with all human beings, we have to consider a whole range of factors when making a judgement.

We have heard some evidence -- I am not sure/sure if it has been communicated to you -- to the effect that at his clubs and summer camps Hamilton appeared to display no -- and I stress "normal" in this context -- no normal kindness or affection towards the boys, even if they were homesick or upset, whereas you or I might comfort a child in a perfectly normal way. There did not appear to be any characteristic of this nature in Hamilton's make-up? - I was not aware of that.

If that is the position does that add anything to your knowledge of him? - It adds weight to the view that he lacked empathy, which I have stated in my second report.

Turning to page 10 of the second report, you are dealing here with sexual sadism? - Yes.

In the middle of the paragraph you make reference to a work by Brittain in 1970? - The first report?

The one on Hamilton specifically which I have been calling the second report, because it is the second one you mentioned? - Yes. On page nine?

Page 10? - Yes.

Just to avoid any confusion, this is the report dealing specifically with Thomas Watt Hamilton, page 10? - Yes.

In the context of sexual sadism you make reference to some work by a gentleman or lady called Brittain in 1970? - A gentleman; yes.

This suggested that sexual sadists' interests in weapons is unusual? - Yes.

It says ".....they" -- that is the weapons -- "have an attraction for him far beyond what they have for an ordinary collector, and he may 'love' them, handling, and in the case of firearms, dismantling them and cleaning them for long periods of time. He has strong feelings about them, they have special favourites, and he can even have 'pet' names for these".

LORD CULLEN: I think you are quoting quite correctly, but from the other report, Mr. Campbell./

Campbell.

MR. CAMPBELL: Am I? Oh, dear. The confusion is entirely mine. I do apologise.

Page 10? - Yes.

The question I want to ask you is this. In the case of a person such as this is such a person more attracted to guns in the first place or does his attraction come after the guns have been made available to him? - It is difficult to know. As I tried to indicate yesterday, these conditions are relatively rare, and I think it is most likely that the interest in weapons is there first, and people seek access to them.

If I revert again for a moment to Hamilton as an individual, you told us he had paedophile tendencies? - Yes.

And you told us a considerable amount of other things about him? - Yes.

Is it a pure coincidence that he was also interested in guns? - Because he was interested in paedophilia?

Yes? - I think the majority of paedophiles would not necessarily be interested in weapons.

So there is some other trait or aspect to his character which explains his interest in guns? - Yes.

We have heard some evidence that he occasionally called his guns his friends or his babies? - Yes.

Does that seem to bear some relationship to what Brittain was talking about? - Yes, it seems to fit with what Brittain is describing.

We also have heard evidence that Hamilton would occasionally talk about his guns or his clubs and/

and rifle clubs, ammunition and the like, to the children in his care. We know of at least some instances where he has gone out of his way to show his guns to children in their homes? - Yes.

From the child's perspective, would that have any influence upon how they regarded Hamilton and his behaviour towards them? Not only did he run these clubs and camps in the way in which we know you have told us about, but these children knew he was a man who had guns. Would that have any bearing upon how a child viewed him? - It is difficult to know, to speculate on that. Many young boys are interested in weapons and guns, and they may have been fascinated by what he was showing them.

If we have agreed this is -- and there is just some evidence of this; I appreciate not a lot -- somebody who has exhibited paedophile tendencies towards young children, might the fact they know he also has a gun have some influence on the way they respond and react, or is this just too speculative? - I think it is just too speculative.

Still on the same report we were looking at a moment ago, and still on the context of sexual sadism, over the page at page 11 we read this: Brittain again in 1970 indicated that murders carried out by sexual sadists are generally planned days or even weeks ahead. "They frequently have low self-esteem, and Brittain contended that their acts of violence frequently occur when their self-esteem is challenged"; is that correct? - Yes.

According to Brittain they "May be vain and egocentric: 'He would rather be notorious than ignored'. His acquaintances may consider him to be 'strange', 'off-beat', 'twisted', 'a loner', 'kinky' or 'a weirdo'"? - Yes.

Here again do we have echoes of some of the material known about Hamilton? - Yes, I think that is the case. The evidence suggests that there were witnesses who felt he was strange. I can't remember the phrase that they used. Secondly, there seems to be good evidence that he was planning or he may have been planning this several months beforehand.

I think there is also, would you agree, some/

some evidence that his self-esteem may have been challenged by the rumours and gossip and police investigation into his conduct? - Yes. The fact that fewer boys were going to his clubs, he had been refused access to places to run his clubs, all these things would have an impact on his self-esteem.

It does appear he took considerable offence at, for example, the police investigation into his conduct; is that correct? - As far as I understand, yes.

Likewise, there would appear to be a degree of social ostracism in his immediate community? - Yes.

At the foot of page 11 in the text of "Poor Anger Control" you tell us that certain individuals may be provoked by for example frustration, perceived injustice or by the perception that they have been treated without due respect? - Yes.

You say "Their responses may be in the form of angry thoughts, physiological arousal or angry and violent behaviour, or indeed combinations of these three classes of response"? - Yes, indeed.

Again does the evidence concerning Hamilton indicate somebody who was constantly conversing in a somewhat unreasonable and aggressive fashion? - Yes. I suppose in terms of the number of letters of complaint he wrote it suggests he was somebody who complained a lot when he was angry.

So when it comes to not only assessing the personality of an individual but more generally in the context of assessing for example his fitness to be entrusted with firearms, would it be important to have regard to the cumulative picture built up over the years about that individual, rather than concentrate on individual episodes? - Yes, it is important to have the history.

And that would be of importance when assessing for example risk factors arising from his possession of weapons? - Yes.

point that has not been covered. GPs are at the moment sometimes asked to be counter-signatories? - Yes.

And one recommendation from the Chief Police Officer is that a medical report should be provided with any application? - Yes, a medical report.

Over and above the question of counter-signatory, that medical report would require some sort of professional capability on the part of a GP to assess personality and psychology. To what extent do you think GPs have that training and ability? - It is not only personality and psychological characteristics that need to be assessed; you would need to have knowledge of all risk factors of violence of paedophilia, which is not part of the training of GPs, and I doubt whether they would have the expertise to carry out the task.

So you think the position of a medical report from a GP in itself would be relatively worthless, because they would not have the training to assess particular characteristics? - I don't think they have the training to assess the risk of violence.

I suppose it would be very difficult in terms of the psychology for a report to be prepared by a specialist such as yourself? - Yes. I tried to make clear in my report that we probably do not have enough trained people to carry out risk assessments in relation to people being released from special hospitals or even from prison, so I don't think there are available experts to do this at the moment.

How many meetings would you need with an applicant to carry out a risk assessment? - In what context?

For the purposes of a firearm certificate, if an applicant was required to produce a medical report, and that included a risk assessment? - I think I have tried to indicate this. It seemed very difficult to predict within the community, where the rate of violence is very low. If one was to interview someone you would need several sessions and access to lots of collateral information/information before I could make a realistic estimate: but then there is always errors.

So would you think the practicalities of producing a medical report with every application or renewal of a firearm certificate -- do you think it would not be practicable? - That is correct.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. TAYLOR: If you would have the report which you prepared in relation to Mr. Hamilton with you, I am interested in what you say at the top of page three in the first paragraph on that page. You say that there is a natural human tendency to explain events, and you refer to "effort after meaning", which you say may result in significant distortion in the recall of events? - Yes.

In what way is the recall of events likely to be distorted? - Memory processes are active processes. It is not like putting information into a computer, which should come out the same way as it goes in. Things which happen subsequent to memories can change the memories, and they can come out in a different form. Can I give you an example of one of them?

Please do? - One study was looking at the cases of Downs Syndrome. This was in the days before people knew it was a chromosomal abnormality. They asked mothers of Downs Syndrome children to count how many frightening experiences they had had, and shocks, during their pregnancy, and they found these mothers had three times as many shocks as people who had no Downs Syndrome children. Now, these mothers were trying to explain what had happened by reorganising their memories. This is a well-established phenomenon, which has been recognised for 60 years.

Applying that to the particular events that we have been looking at at this Inquiry, how do you consider if at all the witnesses' recollections will have been affected by the events of the 13th March? - It may be they can selectively recall parts of Hamilton's behaviour. One witness I think described him as cold, unemotional, like a robot. Now, if you have heard what he has done you may re-interpret what his behaviour was like. Of course, psychologists are not immune from it either, or anyone/anyone else for that matter.

In a sense, what you have been asked to do in the course of this exercise is different from that which you would normally do? - Yes, indeed.

We have been dealing with an event, and we have asked you with hindsight to go back through the personality of an individual and make some sense of it? - Yes.

Whereas normally you would have the personality and try to predict what the future would be? - Yes.

Just how difficult does that make your task in doing what you were asked to do in the second of your two reports? - It makes it quite difficult. You have to balance the evidence as it is presented as I say in my caveats to begin with. It is a difficult task, and one cannot be expected to explain the whole lot.

Yes? - It may have been different if during the risk assessment Hamilton had shown some evidence of threat control mechanism or clear psychopathic traits, but there doesn't appear to have been that in the evidence.

I was interested in some of the descriptions or the labels which you attached to Hamilton? - Yes.

And one of these labels which appears from time to time in your report is that of him being a loner? - Yes.

What do you mean by the use of the label "a loner"?
- He seemed to have very few relationships outside his family. His adult relationships seemed very tentative relationships, and they were not close relationships. From the evidence it seems he did not necessarily disclose things to other people, he did not seem to share his thoughts of violence with other people.

people?

In fairness, I will refer you to the transcript. If you could have the transcript from Day 5 available, and look at page 593? - Yes, I have it.

Right down at the very bottom of the page, the witness, who was a Mr. Anderson, is asked "How often did he call at the house?", and the answer is "To the extent where he began to become a bit of a nuisance, like three to four nights a week"? - Yes.

If you could put that to the side and look at the transcript for Day 3, and in particular page 287, this is the evidence of a Mr. David MacDonald, and in the middle of the page just before the letter C he is asked "Did he phone quite a lot?", and the answer is "He" -- that is Hamilton "did phone me quite frequently, yes, and eventually it got a bit wearing having so many phone calls"? - Yes.

Then if you jump to the bottom, just after the letter E, "So from 1990 right up to 1996 did he continue to keep in touch with you?", and the answer is "Yes". Then he is asked "And how frequently during that period did he speak to you on the phone?", and the answer was "It was maybe a couple of times a week, something like that"? - Yes.

And/

10.40 a.m.

And if we could then look at one more transcript in this connection and that is Day 16 and page 1985. I think this will be a transcript which you will not have had sight of? - No.

You have had sight of the transcripts of Days 1 to 5? - That is correct, yes.

This is Mr. MacFarlane giving evidence and just above letter B he is asked "Q.- Through the 1980's did Hamilton continue to call on you from time to time? A.- Yes, he did.", and then at letter C, "Q.- What about the length of time? A.- Well, they would sometimes go on for about three or four hours in which time he consumed about half a dozen cups of tea and I think every chocolate biscuit you had in the house."? - Yes.

Now, if one takes those passages of evidence and looked at them, does one still become entitled to consider Mr. Hamilton as being a loner? - I think so, because I think we are looking at the quality of the relationship as much as the contact. I mean, there doesn't seem to be any evidence of a close, confiding relationship. At page 1985-B he says "You couldn't carry on a conversation with him". I think Mr. MacDonald referred..... if I have got the correct witness but I may not, I think he referred to it as a telephone relationship at one point.

Yes, that is correct? - So he appears to talk at some people but he doesn't seem to have a close, confiding relationship where he discloses things. In a sense that is what I conceive as an important element of a relationship with other people in regard to forming a relationship of a meaningful type.

Now, in your report you indicated that you considered that there were some traits of him having a sadistic personality disorder? - Yes, indeed.

And I think we will find these traits set out at page 8, is that correct? - Of the report on Hamilton?

Yes, the Hamilton report? - Yes, indeed.

And/

And am I right in thinking that these are the traits which are set out in the first complete paragraph of page 8, the paragraph starting "There is evidence that....."? - Yes.

And where does the evidence conclude in relation to ascertaining whether or not he had this disorder? - Page 9. The second paragraph.

I wonder if we could just look at some of that evidence. You indicate that as part of the examination one has to draw that Hamilton has become amused or gained pleasure from the suffering? - Yes, that is one of the characteristics one might look for.

And is that the characteristic which you were looking at in respect of the analysis of his behaviour? - Yes, that is one of the characteristics.

What were the other characteristics? - Well, for example, restricting the autonomy of other people. The interest in guns and so forth.

I wonder if you could look at the transcript for Day 3, Volume 3 at page 276. This is the evidence of Mrs. Ogilvie who was one of Mr. Hamilton's neighbours. Just below letter C she is asked first of all "Q.- So that on the occasions when there was some conversation between you, who was it that started the conversation off? A.- It was him and I nearly jumped out of my skin. Q.- Can you remember the first time that happened? A.- Well, if I was maybe out the back hanging out my washing, he was there. I never heard him coming but he was there and he would speak and I just got a fright and I would talk but then I just left him."? - Yes.

What in that passage which we have just looked at gives rise to the view that Hamilton derived amusement or pleasure from any conversation or interaction which he had with Mrs. Ogilvie? - It is ambiguous but I thought there was perhaps a possibility he was doing this deliberately but I admit it is ambiguous.

Well, where in that can one define that Mr. Hamilton might have been doing it deliberately? - Well, when she said "he was just there", it sounds/sounds as if he had come up behind her and surprised her.

The other aspect which you talked of a few moments ago was the way in which he restricted his grandfather's or adoptive father's movements in the house? - Yes.

Did you read the statement from the grandfather, the adoptive father, Mr. Hamilton? - Yes, I did.

I wonder if we could look at that. It should be in one of the volumes which you have before you. It is in the second day. We have already referred you to Day 2. I think it is set out on page 210? - I have it, yes.

Page 210 just at letter E I think the passage which you might have had in mind can be found. Mr. Hamilton says "On 24th August, 1992 I moved out of Kent Road and into sheltered housing accommodation. The reason I moved out was that Thomas began to take over the whole house, he moved all my personal possessions and items of furniture into my bedroom, some pictures I had on the wall and my telephone and other personal items. I just could not be bothered with it all and went to Stirling District Council and they arranged for me to move". Is that the passage you had in mind? - That and also I think there was a witness who suggested that Mr. Hamilton's adoptive father was restricted in terms of his access to the house. He would come home at night and would be kept outside for 20 minutes and so forth. So that together.

Yes, that was Mr. Dewar? - Yes.

Considering these passages did you also have regard to the evidence given by Mrs. Watt and Mrs. Watt's friend, Mrs. Sutherland? - Yes, I'm aware of that.

You see, on page 204, and I don't think it is necessary for you to have this passage before you, Mrs. Watt indicated that.....she is asked "Q.- In general terms what was the cause of the disagreement? A.- I can't tell you, I don't know, they just kept arguing; you see, my Daddy drinks and he used to come in and Tommy would be in his bed and/and he used to wake him up and start arguing with him"? - Yes.

And Mrs. Sutherland was asked a similar question at page 207 on Day 2. "Q.- Did you ever see him in recent years in the company with Thomas Hamilton?", he being the adoptive father? - Yes.

And the answer was "No, never". "Q.- What sort of relationship did you understand they enjoyed? A.- Very bad. Q.- What was the cause of the problems? A.- The father's drinking."? - Yes.

Couldn't we find another explanation, perhaps a perfectly innocent explanation, for Hamilton's conduct towards the adoptive father? - That is one possible explanation, yes.

And is it just as likely an explanation as the explanation which you advanced, being a function of his personality trait? - No, I think the evidence of the personality trait is based on more than just, you know, the relationship with the father. I mean, it is the interest in guns and I think the lack of empathy which we have heard evidence of and so forth. So, I mean, in all human situations there are complex factors involved. Drinking might have been a factor and personality might have been a factor but again we can't necessarily add weight to which one is the most important but probably a combination of things.

In attaining the Degrees and qualifications which you have told us about yesterday, you would have spent a considerable amount of time in study and learning presumably? - Yes.

Can you say for how long you studied? - Six years full-time and five years part-time doing a Ph.D.

Would much of that training have been directed towards analysing the behavioural patterns of individuals and drawing conclusions therefrom? - Much of it would be, yes, and in the treatment and management.

And thereafter the treatment and management, / management, I appreciate that? - Yes.

So you would be looking at events and drawing conclusions from them, which perhaps I might not be able to do, as a consequence of the training which you have had? - Perhaps, yes.

You have been asked to paint a picture of Hamilton and you very fairly told us of the difficulties in so doing, given the manner in which one must now do it. Can you tell me what base information you had about him? What material did you have before you when you were trying to paint a picture? - Essentially I had the transcripts from the first five days of the Inquiry, I had access to the video tapes, extracts of video tapes of Hamilton and I had access to some of the summaries produced by the police during their investigations and I think I note this in the introduction to the second report.

I beg your pardon, if you have done that I apologise if I have overlooked it. Yes, I do beg your pardon. I see that there? - I also discussed the case with Detective Chief Superintendent John Ogg to get an over-view of the evidence.

BY LORD CULLEN: Just one matter perhaps I can ask you about before you are re-examined. You were asked some questions by Mr. Campbell dealing with the matter generally about situations where violence might erupt and one situation would be in the process of confrontation? - Yes.

I can see how a person might react in some situations where he was faced with somebody else who was, let's say, belligerent or complaining? - Yes, indeed.

Now, in the case of Hamilton we seem to have a number of insights suggesting that in confrontation he was extremely cool, if not cold and highly controlled. I hope I am correctly representing the evidence. For example, I don't know if you have read about this but we heard of evidence where two women deposited rubbish, noxious substances, on him? - Yes.

And his response was extremely restrained. No/

No complaint, no kind of reaction at all? - Yes.

Do you know the incident I am talking about? - No, I am not aware of it. Oh, yes, I am. I beg your pardon. Yes, I know the incident.

The two ladies, Mrs. Haggard and somebody else? - Yes.

Now, does that tell you anything about his characteristics in that situation for a start? - It is quite interesting to Megargee, who I refer to in my report, who has classified different types of violent offender and describes people who are what he calls over-controlled personalities. These people are often timid, unassertive, individuals who don't appear to react in the way that Hamilton didn't appear to react. They can tolerate or they appear to tolerate a lot of provocation without reacting but when they do react they react in a very dramatic way. Megargee describes this and the evidence for it in the literature is not very convincing and certainly clinically I think I have only seen one case in my career.

Is he one of the authors in your report? - Yes, Megargee. He describes an over-controlled personality. There is not full agreement that this exists in the psychological community but he insists that it does.

We have also had him described as being somebody who planned things very carefully? - Yes.

Perhaps I should not extrapolate this too far but would that tend to suggest that in his case if there was violence it arose out of calculation as it were? It was fairly cold and calculated? Is that a fair reading rather than an instinctive response? - Yes, it appears from the evidence I have that it was planned and it was cold and calculated.

I don't want to misrepresent what you have said? - No, I would agree with that.

RE-EXAMINED BY MR. LAKE: Just to return to a matter which was raised as possible confusion yesterday afternoon. In the conclusion of your first report you conclude that psychological risk assessment/assessment would not provide a satisfactory basis for the prediction of violent behaviour in individuals of a community, is that correct? - That is correct, yes.

That is both because of the accuracy rate of such tests in a community setting? - Yes.

Or because of the practical difficulty in carrying out sufficient tests? - That is correct.

At the same time, I think you said in your evidence that certain factors, the ones you take into account in assessing that Hamilton could suffer from a sadistic personality disorder, might have been sufficient to ring alarm bells in relation to both the possession of firearms and having care of children? - Yes, indeed.

In a situation where you might not regard these as being sufficient to permit you to predict violence, on what basis do you consider that they would have rung alarm bells for you? - Well, I would be concerned that someone like that would have access and the opportunity to engage in paedophilia or to have access to handguns.

On/

11.00 a.m.

On what basis would you be concerned that they had access to handguns? What would your concern be if they had access to handguns? - Are we talking about sadistic characteristics?

Someone who displayed the characteristics which you have taken into account? - What characteristics? Say psychomatic personalities?

If I refer to the characteristics in particular, I think they are contained in the second of your two reports and they run from the foot of Page 7 through Page 8 to the top of Page 9, and I think those are matters I put to you yesterday in regard to ringing alarm bells, and you said yes? - Yes.

Why would someone who displayed those characteristics give you concern if they were to hold a firearm? - Well, it seems to me that they enjoy dominating other people and humiliating other people, and the use of the firearm potentially could be used for that purpose.

And is that because all the characteristics come together or is it any one of them would produce that? - The characteristics of sadistic personality disorder?

The ones enumerated here? - Well, they are all linked; they are all inter-correlated; they tend to occur together because it is a cluster syndrome, so the fact that he has a particular way or style of inter-acting with other people would make me concerned.

And that concern would exist notwithstanding the fact you didn't feel able to say that you would predict this as being someone who would commit a violent act? - Yes; it is a different threshold of concern.

I think you said in response to a question by my learned friend, Mr. Campbell, we are dealing with two different things here, and these two different things you have in mind, on the one hand predicting violence and on the other hand safety/safety with a firearm? - Yes, I think these are two distinct concerns, yes.

I don't want to push you into saying more than you wish here, but do you feel able to say that even although you might be able to provide an accurate prediction of violence, you could identify people who would raise concerns that they would have firearms by psychological means? - Yes, I think you could, but you would have a very high "false positive" rate. Supposing someone comes along and they are experiencing major psychotic symptoms or are psychopathic, psychopathic people don't always go on to be violent, but would be a risk factor, and I would suggest that those people should be excluded from having firearms, but it doesn't mean that I would necessarily predict that that individual would go on to be violent, but that class of individual is at a higher risk than other people.

I may be asking too much, but could you estimate what proportion of "false positives" might arise if such a broad approach was to be taken to excluding people from having Firearms Certificates? - I don't have the necessary information about personality disorders in the general population.

Is that something which might be available in the document that is published next week? - From the American situation, but I think those are different. We know there is great cross-cultural differences in the rate of psychopathic personality disorders, much higher in North America than in this country, fortunately.

Fortunately for us? - For us.

If I could refer you now to the report on Hamilton? - Yes.

On Page 8, at the end of the paragraph relating to Hamilton getting amusement or pleasure from the suffering of others, you say in the sentence there "There is no evidence of cruelty to animals"? - That I am aware of.

to engage in something called "bunny hunts" where he would go out in his car trying to catch rabbits in the headlights trying to startle them and then run them over? - I wasn't aware of that.

Would that be a material factor in your consideration? - He was doing this as an adult presumably?

A young adult? - Yes, that would cause me some concern, yes.

Do you consider the events of the 13th March indicate a sudden and dramatic deterioration in Hamilton's -- it might be colloquially said that he had flipped -- or part of a continuing process? - I think it is probably part of a long-term process. I think he had personality difficulties. There was evidence that he was planning this at least two months beforehand, tentative evidence of that, so I don't think he flipped, no.

Taking the factors you do know about Hamilton's behaviour in relation to children? - Yes.

Which I think we have had referred to as being elements of cruelty in hitting them, a lack of care, if those matters were made known and referred to a Council, would you be able to advise them after an interview or certain other investigations as to the suitability of that person having access to children? - It depends on the quality of the information you get and the extent to which the person being interviewed cooperated at the interview. I think, as I indicated yesterday, paedophiles, even those who are convicted, will deny their behaviour, so it is very difficult to determine from an interview.

If it is a matter on which the local authority had expressed some concern, and said to someone he would not be permitted access to children unless he were to submit to interviews, and he would not be allowed access until someone in your position expressed that they were satisfied that it was safe for him to do so, do you think you would be able to express such satisfaction that it was safe for him ever? - In a sense it depends what investigations I am allowed to do.

What/

What investigations would you require to do? - I would need detailed information from background sources and I would need to be able to interview the individual for some considerable time and I would need to use some indirect measure of sexual arousal such as we referred to.

And that was quite intrusive? - Yes; penile measurements in response to pornographic pictures.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you, Professor. I am very much obliged to you for your evidence and the very great amount of work you have put into your two reports.

HUGH DILAHAY DAVIES (67), Sworn:

EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMY: Are you Hugh Dilahay Davies? - I am, sir.

And are you the immediate past President of the Association of Police Surgeons? - That is correct, sir.

What age are you? - 67.

What are your professional qualifications? - Master of Arts; Batchelor of Medicine; Batchelor of Surgery, and holder of the Diploma in Medical Jurisprudence.

How long have you been practising medicine? - Since 1955.

And how long did you practice as a police surgeon? - 37 years.

Have you now retired from that? - I am retired as the Principal Police Surgeon to the Northamptonshire Force, but I am still used as consultant by Northamptonshire & Warwickshire Police, and occasionally other police forces.

Are you used independently as a consultant by those acting for say the defence of an/

an accused? - Oh yes.

In that capacity, do you describe yourself as an independent consultant forensic medical examiner? - I do.

That is an expression I don't think we are very familiar with in Scotland. Is it an expression, "Forensic Medical Examiner" which is used commonly in England? - It's now becoming more common. It started with the Metropolitan Police about 10 years ago when they re-named their police surgeons forensic medical examiners because the doctors and the police did not want to be seen as being too partisan to the police.

So it was a cosmetic change of name? - A cosmetic change of name; I think up here in Scotland they are still called police surgeons.

To be a police surgeon, do you need to belong to the Association? - No. The membership of the Association is for police surgeons, but there are a large number of doctors who are in general practice, and unfortunately do not do much police work and they do not need to join the Association. This is a view of course with which I do not hold.

Are your members largely full-time police surgeons then? - No; our doctors are generally medical practitioners who have taken extra post-graduate study in forensic medicine in order to deal with the work that they do.

So is there a normal additional qualification to do the job of police surgeon? - Yes; the qualification which you should have is the Diploma in Medical Jurisprudence.

And is that organised by one body, or can that qualification be obtained in a number of places? - No, it's only obtained in London through the Society of Apothecaries, but they do also -- the Society does have examinations in Australia, and they are this year having an examination in Hong Kong.

So can I take it from what you have said so far that the majority of police surgeons in the country are General Practitioners who do the job of police surgeon part-time as an additional element in their/

their practice? - That is correct.

Their experience will therefore vary according to where they are really? - It will indeed.

Can you tell me the size of the Association, the membership? - Yes, just over 1,000.

And can we compare that with the number of police surgeons there are in the United Kingdom? - Well, it is difficult to be accurate on this, particularly as in some areas the police do not appoint police surgeons with a contract, but they call on the occasional general practitioner to come occasionally to do the work.

We estimate that there are something like 2,000 members who are called upon by the police to render medical aid.

The reason you have been invited to give evidence here is to see whether there is a role for the police surgeon and indeed the general practitioner in the process of deciding whether or not a person should have a Firearms Certificate. Now, you will be familiar yourself with the role that a general practitioner, quite apart from a police surgeon, may play in that process at the moment. He may be in the category of person who might sign or countersign an application for a Firearms Certificate in the sense of supporting the application, but we have heard some evidence already in the Inquiry that there are circumstances in which the police may obtain consent from an applicant or holder of a certificate and approach his general practitioner for information. Now, do you have any direct experience personally of dealing with applicants for Firearms Certificates and either supporting their application or providing information to the police for their consent? - Yes, I have, considerable, because I live in a country area outside Northampton and I think I have been signing and countersigning applications for Firearms Certificates for many years.

Does the role of the doctor as a potential countersignatory create any difficulty for him in his practice? - It isn't personally to me, but I could quite easily see how it could, and I personally would be -- I agree with doctors that we really/really shouldn't do this job of countersigning.

Why do you say that? - Well, it could upset the doctor/patient relationship. If one of the people that I have signed certificates for -- if I had said to him "Look, I don't think you should have a certificate because you are mentally unstable; you have got a short fuse", he may well -- it would first of all break up the relationship, but he might even be the sort of person who could take revenge on me.

11.20 a.m.

So it then places us in an uncomfortable position. I think the only thing you can do under these circumstances is make up some excuse as to why you can't do it.

You will be aware that the medical profession in general through the BMA in particular have expressed concern about being involved in some positive role in the process of certification for firearms holders, and I take it you understand that concern? - I do.

We will perhaps explore later this morning whether there is a negative rather than a positive role for the doctor. Am I right in saying that the Association which you represent see a role for its members in the process? - Yes, we do.

Will you tell us what is the role that you envisage for your members? - Have the Court got the document I handed in this morning, the flow chart of our ideas?

Yes. This will be R66. Do you have your own copy?
- Yes.

That is the one which shows the things which you envisage taking place? - That is correct.

Would you find it best to use this in illustrating how you see the police surgeon playing his part in the process? - I would like to refer to this.

Please do, and take us through it? - We see in the Association that the police surgeon or forensic medical examiner, that is the medical examiner to the Chief Constable, can play a useful role as a preliminary medical screener. By this we mean that when the person applies for a firearm, in his application form it would include the bona fide reason for the need to have a firearm, such as occupation, field sports, member of a gun club. In addition to including that reason the application form should have a medical questionnaire which the applicant can fill in.

Yes? - This medical questionnaire would be similar to the type of thing which was filled in when you apply for a life insurance or a sickness insurance policy, and of course there would be legal penalties for false declarations or failing to disclose? - Yes. That questionnaire would be seen by the police surgeon, and with that he would write to the person's general practitioner or any other appropriate doctor who is mentioned in the questionnaire, and get a medical report.

Yes? - We envisage that the vast majority of medical reports, there will be no problems, and we can inform the Chief Constable that there are no problems, medical problems, with this application.

Can I interrupt you at that point to establish what information you envisage getting from the named doctor at that stage? - Any serious illnesses, particularly illnesses which might affect one's mental capacity. Also, there is an advantage. If one is writing to a general practitioner, that general practitioner as a family doctor has an insight into the personality of the person making the application. For instance, he may, to use a phrase I have used before, have a short fuse, he might lose his temper quickly, he might beat up his wife or kids, there may be something about him which the GP would like to communicate to another doctor, but at the moment under the present system he is unable to do so.

Now, this would require a specific form of mandate to be completed in the application form; is that correct? - That is correct.

And it would also involve the GP or family doctor not having to make a judgement himself? - That is correct.

However, it does also involve inviting him to say things about his patient which are to some extent based on general experience of him rather than answering a medical question; is that right? - To a certain extent, yes.

Now, whether or not you get that information I presume might depend on the particular general practitioner? - Yes; there would be some variety./

variety.

There could be no way of compelling the disclosure of that sort of information? - No. I think GPs as a whole take their public duty seriously, and as with people who drive cars who are medically unfit, they do tend to try and persuade the patient to report his medical condition to the DVLA at Swansea, or if the patient does not do so the GP does it himself.

I think we are envisaging here a mandate authorising the GP to disclose information to you as a police surgeon; is that right? - Yes.

And therefore once the mandate goes to the GP you would expect him to answer that question, I presume? - I would. And if he felt uneasy, if the GP felt uneasy, I would expect him to tell me. But it is on a doctor-to-doctor basis; there is nobody else involved. Quite often doctors do talk between themselves. In fact when you are referring a patient to a specialist you quite often say things to the specialist you wouldn't say or wouldn't necessarily say to the patient you are seeing.

Now, if we have reached the stage that there are no problems, as you have described it in your flow chart, I take it by that you mean there is no obvious reason to suggest the applicant is unfit to hold a firearm certificate? - That is so.

It is a negative statement rather than a positive one, to the effect that he is fit to hold a certificate; or do you envisage going that far? - I would say from the past history. I don't think it is practically possible to have a full medical examination of every person who applies for a certificate. Apart from the logistics of the thing there is the fact that even a full medical examination by one doctor cannot visualise how a person is going to turn bad later and do something, as has happened here.

Yes? - What I can say is that at least we have done a medical screening, and we have not let somebody through who has got a history of mental illness, schizophrenia, many of the things that would in my opinion be an indication against holding a firearms certificate.

We/

We have been listening to some psychological expert evidence in the last few days telling us how difficult it is to forecast that a person might be violent and how difficult it also is to forecast that a person might demonstrate paedophile tendencies towards children. Bearing that in mind, it is quite difficult to imagine a doctor, even a police surgeon, being able positively to say "This is a man who is fit to hold a certificate", whereas it is easier to understand him saying that there is no obvious reason why he should not hold one? - You have summed it up very well. I entirely agree you cannot say this person cannot turn violent; you can't.

We have got to the stage where the person at the initial screening has demonstrated no obvious signs which render him unfit. If that is not easily determined, what further stages do you envisage in this process? - I think further changes would be either any medical records from a hospital, hospital records, reports from specialists he has seen, and it might be necessary to examine or interview the applicant yourself: I have left that open.

What do you mean by that? - I visualise that possibly rather than one doctor doing it the appropriate specialist might be involved as well, so that there is some further diagnostic exercise.

I think you have actually gone as far as to put in a suggestion of a final medical panel? - That is what I would say, a specialist and a police surgeon. For example, in a case where I suspected there was some mental instability or a short fuse I would sit with a forensic psychiatrist and interview the chap with the forensic psychiatrist probably taking the lead.

Now, you have suggested also in your presentation here the change in the way you envisage the law working at the moment? - Yes.

And you suggest it should be incumbent upon an applicant to prove positively that he is fit to hold a firearms certificate rather than incumbent on the Chief Constable to be satisfied he is not fit; is that right? - That is correct.

And I take it that that suggestion is there/

there because of this whole scheme that you propose, which involves a fairly detailed examination of the fitness of the individual?
- Yes.

So that if he fails he does not get the certificate because he has not passed the test, the onus on him, to demonstrate his fitness; is that correct? - That is correct, yes.

All right. So we go through the whole screening. There are a number of possible results at the end of the more detailed process that you envisage. Can you tell us what the possibilities are? - The possibilities are that somewhere along the line you may decide there are no medical problems, and you will inform the Chief Constable that there are no medical problems.

Yes? - There are of course other investigations going on on the police side, and it is the Chief Constable's decision. He has got his police evidence to weigh up as well, and he will certainly have yours, that there appear to be no medical problems.

Yes? - On the other hand, if the medical panel felt that there was a risk or that the person was not medically suitable to hold a licence we would tell the Chief Constable that he was not medically suitable. Now, because of the point of confidentiality we would in these circumstances not give a reason: all we would say is that the patient is not medically suitable.

Now, these are two fairly clear-cut situations. What about the position where you could not put your finger on medical unfitness: you have a plausible applicant -- we have heard psychological evidence that if he is a paedophile he will be plausible and that he will lie to you -- but you have got this gut feeling that there is something there that you cannot nail. How do you deal with that? - That is a difficult problem. I see no answer to it. I am sure you will get cases like that, and I honestly cannot answer that question. But at least you have made some medical enquiry; you have made an effort.

I wonder if the answer is not in your scheme at the moment. If the onus is on the applicant/

applicant to demonstrate his fitness and he has not satisfied you, but you could not actually pin down a specific medical reason, do you see a basis for you, acting responsibly, still saying that you are not satisfied of his fitness? - I think so.

Or is that one that would present your members with real difficulty? - I really don't know the answer to that question for my membership. Speaking for myself, however, I think I would certainly err on the side of caution.

Now, can I ask you to look at the second page of your submission? - Yes.

You have actually told us more or less what is here. In the second numbered paragraph you mention the way in which the material would be obtained from the GP, by using a form similar to that currently used for life assurance medical reports or by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Authority, but tailored specifically for the purpose of firearms licensing? - Yes.

Now, can you help us with information about the sort of form used by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Authority? - I have not filled in one of these for many years now, but to the best of my memory the form is filled in by the applicant, and it asks various questions, such as "Do you have any loss of consciousness?" and things like that.

Yes? - This form goes to the DVLA. The DVLA doctors then write to the GP, and they write specifically, saying that the person has mentioned this on his application form, "Can you elucidate further?".

So it is a form used and triggered by the applicant himself disclosing his medical condition? - Yes, indeed.

Now, in relation to firearms licensing am I right in thinking that you envisage the automatic use of this form of enquiry? - Yes. Not necessarily the same form as the DVLA, but one tailored for this situation.

But they are only dealing with particular cases; you would be dealing with every applicant for/

for a firearms certificate? - Yes.

In paragraph 3 you mention at the end that in your assessment you should also be supplied by the police with any other non-medical evidence thought to be relevant? - Yes.

So you envisage the police providing you with information before you advise the Chief Constable? - Yes. The two investigations are going on in parallel, the medical investigation and the police enquiries, and again the police may have some information which is relevant.

And you also in paragraph 5 mention the need for frequency of examination; is that right? "This system should operate as frequently as reasonably practicable"? - Yes.

And it is suggested at one stage that an annual renewal is one possibility, or legislation could be framed so as to place the onus on the GP to advise the police surgeon if the holder of a certificate became for example mentally unwell, or other circumstances had changed? - Yes.

So you envisage either a more regular renewal of the certificate than we have at present or a duty on the GP to tell the police surgeon if certain things change? - Yes.

Now, that raises difficulties of defining the circumstances you envisage having to be disclosed. Is there some easy way to identify these? - First of all, it is very much a matter of political will: but the most important thing is that they have been granted a certificate, and if there is any medical condition that comes up during the time, whether it is for one, two, three years, that medical information should be divulged, preferably by the applicant, but if not, as with driving cases, if the patient does not divulge it then the GP has a duty to do it himself under the provisions.

If we take driving as an example for the moment, is there some sort of recognised category of conditions that have to be disclosed? - Oh, yes; epilepsy is one, loss of consciousness and sudden loss of consciousness, eyesight changes.

Now, /

Now, in relation to firearms what sort of information do you envisage having to disclose, starting with the applicant disclosing them? - Treatment for any mental illness.

Anything else? - Severe body illness, not mental illness, which might affect his clear thinking.

Now, one of the problems you have identified about this whole area is that there are statutory obligations nowadays on doctors to tell patients what they are telling other people? - Yes, that is Access to Medical Reports Act and the Access to Medical Records Act. We feel that anybody involved in this process should have exemption from those Acts.

The very last thing you mention in your submission is a central firearms licensing and registration agency similar to the DVLA. Now, what advantage do you see in the process that you envisage for having such a centralised body? - Well, I think if for example you are refused a licence in Scotland and you come down to Northampton then we would be able to, through a central agency, find out that you had been turned down by another authority.

People quite frequently move from one area to another. Do you envisage that to present a problem unless there is some centralised way of recording information which has been obtained about individuals in the course of the licensing process? - Well, yes, particularly travelling communities. People travel all over the country and move from place to place. This would be a way of keeping a check on them.

Do you think police surgeons with their current experience are well placed to do this job or are we talking about starting now a long learning process? - Well, I think in the position they hold and have held for many years as medical advisers to their Chief Constable they are in a good position. I think there will have to be some learning process but I think at least you have got people in the position physically, also being almost in the same office as the Chief Constable. You have got the people there who can be trained further. When eventually the procedure is decided, they can be trained to put it into operation.

examination or do you think that it is something that should be done by all of them? - No, I think it will be the equivalent in the Police Forces to myself. I was the principal police surgeon of the Northamptonshire Police. It would be myself and my depute rather than every police surgeon in Northamptonshire.

I think there are examples in Scotland of full-time police surgeons, in Strathclyde in particular? - Yes. I think in that situation of course a full-time police surgeon would do it. There are in England some, not officially full-time but they spend more time on police surgeon work than any other work. There are more and more of them now, particularly in the larger cities. About three-quarters of their time is spent with Police Forces.

One other problem I would like to ask you about is we have heard some evidence already of cases where individuals who don't hold Firearms Certificates do things which have an obvious relevance to whether or not in the future they should get a Firearms Certificate. For example, they make threats to use firearms against animals or people. Do you see any way of keeping tabs on that type of information if it comes into the hands of either a general practitioner or a police surgeon and relating it then to any future application for a Firearms Certificate? - It is very difficult to keep tabs on that sort of information. Probably the police are more experienced at that than we are because of their contacts with people and domestic violence.

So that depends on relaying information through the criminal intelligence system? - Yes, indeed. Mind you, there could be a contribution certainly in the domestic violence situation that general practitioners could make because we do occasionally deal with families where there is quite a bit of domestic violence and threats going on.

Yes, I am envisaging a situation where either something about a firearm crops up or you know that the person is likely at some future stage to apply for a Firearms Certificate. Then it might be appropriate to expect somehow or other doctors to relay that information to police intelligence? - I would/would hope so and that could be done without them breaking their confidentiality by them contacting the police surgeon on a doctor-to-doctor basis.

Now, the only other particular issue I want to raise with you is the extent to which you envisage surgeons being capable of making assessments about a person's mental rather than physical state in an examination because I assume that while you will all receive some general training as students in psychiatry and psychology, is that right? - Yes.

Very few will have any specialist knowledge of these subjects? - Well, I think one would have to admit the level of one's own competence or incompetence and if you have a case where you are uneasy about this then that is a case that should be referred to a psychiatrist. A forensic psychiatrist preferably.

And that is why you envisaged this panel of interviewers including a forensic psychiatrist? - Yes.
Or perhaps a psychologist? - Yes.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. CAMPBELL: Can we look for a moment at R66, the flow document. Has this document been circulated amongst other members of the Association for their comment and approval? - The document itself has not. The original document was a working paper produced by one of our members and was debated at the Council of the Association on the 9th of May at which I was present. I was Chairman of the Council. That is the paper that we based it on. This flow chart is a simplified version of that.

So is the answer to my question no, it has not been circulated? - No, it has not been circulated to all 1,000 members but the Council of the Association has met the Regional representatives which is 20 strong. There are representatives from each Region and we discussed it at the Council meeting. The Annual General Meeting was the day after the Council and they voted that we should proceed with it.

So how many out of the thousand members would be present when that was debated? - There were/

were 20 at the Council meeting and the Annual General Meeting I think was about 200. Well no, 150.

Has there been any consultation with other interested parties, for example the BMA? - Yes, we brought it up to the Forensic Medicine Sub-Committee of the BMA and they were in general agreement with us. There was some concerns expressed about confidentiality but I think the BMA delegation representative will deal with that. The BMA are happy as long as communication is on a doctor-to-doctor basis.

And would the exercise be carried out by any qualified police surgeon? - I don't envisage that. I think we envisage it to be carried out by the senior police surgeon, the principal police surgeon in the Force. Senior, whatever you like to call him. Each Force has got one. The leading or principal police surgeon and his depute.

You have told us that you have counter-signed applications for Firearms Certificates for many years? - Yes.

What was it that resulted in you counter-signing applications for Firearm Certificates for many years? - Well, because the doctor is one of the named Council signatories and for some reason they don't want to go to someone responsible like their bank manager or the other people named on the list. They always tend to choose the doctor and I was a village doctor so naturally the farming community and the villagers around used to come to me.

If we look at R66 for a moment on the second page and paragraph 3. The advice is that there should be a reversal of the presumption of law which at present assumes a person is a fit and proper person to hold a licence unless determined otherwise. Can we infer from that that it is your experience that the law is operated at present on the basis that there is a presumption in favour of granting? - Yes, that is what I feel because I do know that in the County of Northamptonshire that sometimes where a person is not granted a certificate then they do appeal to the Crown Court to see if they can have that reversed. It doesn't happen/happen often but it does happen.

So the system is operated with that in the back of the policeman's mind? - Yes.

We have heard evidence that Hamilton had not been to his G.P. for more than 20 years so the system which you are discussing would not have played much of a part in this particular case? - It would seem not to be, no.

BY LORD CULLEN: Just to take up that point. How would you cope with a situation of that sort where a patient had been rarely in contact with his doctor? - If the patient had been rarely in contact with his doctor I think this would be a case where I would want to meet him and see him. You know he would be one of the cases that I would call up for interview.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. GIBB: We have heard from Professor Cooke this morning, a forensic psychiatrist, that his view is that four or five meetings at least would be needed before it would be possible to do any risk assessment on the psychiatric side. I mean, physically is it possible if a police surgeon is involved in that amount of involvement with so many firearms applications? - No, it is not physically possible but I think if you do interview somebody and, as you say, four or five times to do a proper psychiatric assessment, I think that is where I would refer them to a psychiatrist.

BY LORD CULLEN: Presumably you would not go on to that stage unless you had sufficient concern to advance to that, is that right? - That is what I mean, yes.

RE-EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMOY: Simply one question on timing here. In your experience is it the fittest members of the community who don't see their doctors very often or can you draw any conclusion about fitness from the fact that a person does not go to his doctor? - That is a very good point and I have not really thought about it until now but in my experience I have a regular number of people that I have signed certificates for. They are usually fit people, farmers and gamekeepers, and so I very rarely see them as a doctor. I usually see/see them socially. So, yes, some of my people I only see when I sign their certificate.

BY LORD CULLEN: Just one point; I know to some extent you have touched on this already but can you perhaps sort of crystallise for me what you think would be the merit of introducing police surgeons or forensic medical examiners into the scene that we are discussing? - Well, I think it is not a perfect screening system but at least it is an effort at doing medical screening without involving the patient's general practitioner in a face-to-face confrontation with his patient and also giving at least somebody that the Chief Constable can turn round to for medical opinion.

Of course, I suppose you could have a system in which every G.P. was required to submit the kind of report that you were talking about to the Chief Constable and what you are talking about is what is done with it, is that right? You say that is where somebody in your position would have a role to play? - Yes, because the G.P. cannot do a report on his patient to the Chief Constable because of medical confidentiality.

Well, would there be a difficulty about obtaining consents, if there was proper consents given in advance, for the applicant to agree to that being done, or do you see that great difficulties would arise there? - I can foresee difficulties in getting consent for medical information to be divulged to a non-medical person, namely the Chief Constable. The parallel is insurance companies. They insist on medical information but at least the patient, when he fills in his insurance application form knows it is looked at by the insurance doctor, a doctor in the insurance company.

So you are keeping it so to speak contained within a system which does not mean that the information is fully divulged but that it will eventually come to the Chief Constable as a statement as to whether a person is or is not medically suitable? - That is how we envisage it.

And you are acting as a means of determining to what extent any further action is required and if so, what that is? - Precisely.

ARTHUR/

ARTHUR MORRIS, (55), Sworn,

EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMY: Are you on the Council of the British Medical Association? - Yes, I am.

Do you hold a position as Chairman of a sub-committee? - I'm the Chairman of the Scottish Council of the British Medical Association. That is the Council for the Scottish BMA. That in itself I think is a sub-committee of the main Council of the BMA U.K.

And are you actually on the main Council? - Yes.

How long have you been a medical practitioner? - For 30 years.

What are your professional qualifications? - My professional qualifications are M.A., M.B., B.C.H.(I.R.), F.R.C.S.(Edin.) and F.R.C.S. (England).

Are you currently in practice? - I am currently in practice.

As? - As a consultant plastic surgeon.

Can you tell me what the BMA is? - The British Medical Association is a professional organisation representing and having as its membership medical practitioners. It is a large organisation. It represents or its members constitute over 100,000 doctors and it is a very sizeable proportion of the whole medical practitioners of Great Britain. It is probably over 80 per cent plus. In some speciality divisions it is more. Almost 90 per cent.

And that means that it represents not just general practitioners but it represents specialists such as yourself? - Yes, a whole range of medical specialists, what we call crafts. That representation, if I can just enlarge, is done via a divisional system basically which is arranged into divisions locally throughout the United Kingdom and this divisional system is represented in two ways; directly through committees but also through annual representative meetings where one or two representatives/representatives of each division can put forward discussion.

And that is going on this week? - This week in Brighton.

Has it finished? - It finished yesterday, yes.

12.00 p.m.

There is also a body called the General Medical Council; can you tell me what that is please? - The General Medical Council is the statutory body which registers medical practitioners for them to be able to undertake their job as doctors.

Are they the disciplining body at the end of the day?
- Disciplining is part of their remit, yes.

Now, you have had the opportunity of listening to the evidence this morning for, I suspect, fairly obvious reasons, and I think it has been of some assistance to you to have heard particularly Dr. Davies. Have you found that helpful? - Yes.

One of the things I asked him about was the difficulty a doctor might experience because he is asked to be a countersignatory to an application for a Firearms Certificate. Do you know if doctors generally find some difficulty in having to fulfill that role? - Yes; in the first place, doctors when acting as a countersignatory have to be seen as acting not in a purely medical capacity. They are acting in a personal capacity by reason of their standing as one of the eight listed professional groups that can countersign an application, and it is very important to make a distinction when doctors are acting in that capacity. Our concern, or the concern of a lot of doctors, is that by virtue of the doctor being a doctor, and having access to other information, that it should be thought that extra weight can be given on the opinion of the doctor who countersigns that signature, that application, and I would say that in Brighton there was considerable discussion about this particular problem in terms of one motion that was discussed, and that there is considerable division of opinion within the profession.

Did a policy emerge on this? - Yes.

applications. Now, the problem about that was that this was discussion and it was not -- there was no distinction made in the debate about the precise definition between personal capacity of a general practitioner and acting in a medical role in this process.

It might be complicated a bit further by the fact there are couple of medical questions on the application form? - Yes.

About mental fitness and epilepsy? - Yes. I don't have a form in front of me, but I think the doctor has to just countersign, and the applicant themselves fill in the 15 questions, or the 14 questions that's on it, and one of those is that the applicant has to show that they are not suffering from epilepsy and diabetes, I think it is.

Yes, but I think you have to countersign that you have no reason to..... We will get the form in a moment? - Yes, but a bank manager could do that as well, and a bank manager is one of those countersignatories.

Do you think a doctor is in any more invidious position as a countersignatory than for example a Member of Parliament in the sense of giving special endorsement to the applicant? - I would imagine that for example people that apply for gun licences would be youngish, fittish adults, and these are precisely the people that don't go to their general practitioner with illness generally in the main, and therefore I think the general practitioner may have no greater knowledge of the patient in that sense.

No, which is the difficulty that you are mentioning at the moment that I am concerned about, that you feel that you may be viewed as giving added weight over other types of people who are countersignatories simply because you are doctors, and may be expected to know a little more about the person, but you have to know the person to be a countersignatory and to know him for a certain length of time? - Yes.

And many other professions are asked as well to sign these, including Members of Parliament? - Yes.

Now,/

Now, do you think that your difficulty is not really one that is suffered by others as well in a slightly different way? - Yes, I understand the point, yes; I would agree with that.

You can perhaps have a look at one of the application forms, D91L is the one I have here, in L3. It will just be a moment in coming to you. Now, D91, if you have it there, that is an extract of an application form, and it has got a letter unfortunately in the middle of it, but if you can go past the letter, you will find the page with the countersignature at the bottom, Part F. Do you see that? - Yes.

And at the foot you will see that the countersignatory is certifying that "To the best of my knowledge and belief, the information given in answer to questions 1 to 15 above is true". Have you got that? - Yes.

And if you go back to the first page and look at Question 14, you will see mention of epilepsy and mental disorder? - Yes.

So I suppose you are being asked in a professional capacity as well as a personal capacity to say something about the applicant, and that is putting an extra burden on a doctor? - That is the concern of the profession.

You will see also that the second statement is "I know of no reason why the applicant should not be permitted to possess a firearm". Do you see that as perhaps expecting a doctor to say something professionally rather than simply personally? - This is the concern, that it might be seen as that from the public perception point of view, but technically the doctor is signing in the same status as any other professional.

One other difficulty Dr. Davies mentioned was in the relationship between patient and doctor, that because a doctor might from time to time on a personal basis have to say no, that that can cause difficulties in the professional relationship. Do you see that as a problem? - I could envisage that as a problem, yes indeed.

Have you yourself ever signed these forms?/

forms? - I think I have once signed a form.

Now, Dr. Davies has also outlined a proposed scheme in which contact would be made between a police surgeon and a general practitioner or other named doctor that an applicant had referred to in his application. Without really having to spell out what you have already heard this morning, can I have your reaction to that please? - Could you just repeat the precise point?

Yes; he outlined in his evidence this morning a scheme which would involve a police surgeon obtaining information from a patient's general practitioner, or other doctor that the patient has had contact with, named in his application form as a result of mandate to provide information. What did you make of that idea? - First of all, it would obviously require the patient's complete consent to any confidential matters of that nature.

That is probably not a problem because he will just be told he's not getting his Firearms Certificate unless he cooperates, so it is therefore fairly easy to get consent? - Yes.

So assuming we have got that? - Disclosure of the information -- it would then be very important that what happened to this information afterwards, because if this information was given from one doctor to another, as in for example an application for life insurance or something of that nature, it is specifically given to the medical officer employed in the Life Association Company rather than in general to the other employees in that Company, and it is very important that specific medical details are kept confidential. It is a very very important point.

I think he envisaged that happening also, so assuming that we can cope with that difficulty as well, could this work? - Well, I think the problem is that all one could say is it would have to be an extremely well constructed form, and all one could then talk about is what has happened up until that time. It's not a certificate of sanity for example. It cannot say that in the future something else might not happen, or something might change.

You might have detected in the questions I put to Dr. Davies that I don't envisage for a moment a certificate that is framed in a positive way, that a person is positively okay to have a Firearms Certificate? - No.

I am talking about something that might say that "I don't know of anything that is obvious that renders him unfit". Now, assuming we are looking at it from that point of view, has this got some potential? - I think that would have -- yes -- you would have to err on the side of safety, I would think, and if the doctor basically had the slightest reservation that there might be something there, I think he would have to very carefully weigh up the position you have to put to the applicant that he might not be a suitable person to want to do it, or possibly to consider withdrawing the application, but if the applicant persisted, you can envisage a system where you might go through the system; you might try a separate route, and that would put you as a general practitioner in an extremely difficult position.

You mean go elsewhere? - Yes, try again elsewhere.

BY LORD CULLEN: So you would end up with the same problems as the countersignatory? - Yes.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY: That would be of course because of the way you envisage actually trying to persuade the patient first of all to withdraw his application rather than give an adverse report to the police surgeon? - Yes. In this envisaged scheme, would every single applicant have to get a report made on them? This would be a routine thing?

That is what Dr. Davies had in mind; is that another difficulty? - It might be a logistical problem; it might involve a large amount of extra medical work.

Am I right in saying that the way you are looking at this, namely telling the patient first of all, or counselling the patient first of all that perhaps he should withdraw the application, is that the sort of thing you do with drivers? - With/

With driving licences, yes.

Who have come across a change in circumstances that renders them unfit? - Yes.

And your system there is to try to persuade them first of all, and only as a last resort to go over their heads and tell the Licensing Authority that this person suffers from a condition? - Yes, that is correct. There is the difficulty that the registered medical practitioner is registered with the General Medical Council and there is quite strict guidance on that. I understand some copies of that Guidance were sent?

We will come to that in a moment because I do want to ask you about it, but I suspect that bearing the events of the 13th March in mind, that if we are looking at such a scheme as this, some would suggest we should be looking at it in a very peremptory way so that when the consent for the disclosure of medical information is given, it should just be implemented rather than implemented only after a process of counselling the applicant to withdraw his application. If that were envisaged, do you see difficulties for doctors in the patient/doctor relationship? - Yes, I do. If the doctor was to say to somebody "I'm sorry, I can't agree to countersigning that", that could leave the patient, and in this case the applicant for a gun licence, with very little room for manoeuvre, and if it was the sort of person who might not be suitable to get a Firearms Licence in the first place, I think one could feel for the general practitioner putting himself at considerable risk in this type of situation.

It is important not to confuse the role of countersignature with this. We are talking about a quite separate report after the application form has been lodged when the police surgeon would contact you for information and send you a form? - Yes.

As he envisaged already happens in relation to insurance? - Yes.

And you would complete the form? - Yes.

He/

He also envisages you giving him information that you wouldn't be comfortable giving to the patient, your own views to some extent, your own anxieties about a particular patient. Would doctors be comfortable about relaying that type of information to another doctor? - Again, that would have to come under the General Medical Council type of Guidance on relaying information about that, because if that was not being disclosed to the patient what you were doing, and yet you were doing it to another doctor?

So that does present an ethical problem, does it? - No, it doesn't. The difficulty is it depends on whether there is an immediacy of danger or concern, and that would have to be weighed up by the individual practitioner.

So that would be the qualification. There would have to be an immediate danger? - No, not necessarily, but there would have to be justifiable reason. If we could refer to the actual.....?

Yes, I was going to give it an R number, which was going to be R68. The document has been circulated to Parties, and if you have it, it refers to the Guidance? - Yes, this is Guidance, confidentiality from the General Medical Council.

And which part are you referring to? - One section of the whole.....

Paragraph 18? - Paragraph 18, yes, "Disclosure in the interests of others".

And can you read that to us please? - "Disclosures may be necessary in the public interest where a failure to disclose information may expose the patient, or others, to risk of death or serious harm. In such circumstances you should disclose information promptly to an appropriate person or authority".

Is that what enables you to disclose information to the Driving and Vehicle Licensing Authority? - Yes, it is, yes.

The/

12.20 p.m.

The test at the moment would be the same? - The test would be similar, yes.

He also suggested that it would be helpful if doctors were under an obligation to disclose changes in the patient's condition that might affect their fitness to hold a firearm, and a disclosure might also be made to the police surgeon? - Yes. I think that would fall completely within paragraph 18.

So it would have to be on that basis? - Yes.

One of the submissions you have presented to the Inquiry is a letter sent to the Home Affairs Committee investigating similar issues, which refers to the guidance from the General Medical Council and points to circumstances actually occurring, particularly in rural areas, where doctors do learn of the development of deteriorating judgement in patients and do disclose this information? - Yes.

That submission goes on to say that it would be helpful to have a scheme similar to the one which operates for drivers with the DVLA? - Yes.

It talks about a confidential telephone advice and information service. How does that operate? - That would be similar to the driving licence one.

How does that operate? - The driving licence one operates -- there is a helpline which is available, and the medical practitioner rings up the helpline and asks to speak to one of the medical advisers. They can speak to one of the medical advisers to discuss the medical condition of the patient. Following discussion with the doctor, if appropriate the medical adviser sends an application form to the patient to complete, and if that is not returned to the DVLA then the licence is revoked.

Do you envisage an identical arrangement in relation to firearm certificates? - Yes, the same in principle.

I think the crucial difference in what Dr./

Dr. Davies was proposing was that all of this disclosure would be with consent, that you would really not be into the area of the application of the GMC guidelines at all; you would be operating in a situation where the patient has said -- obviously, because he is not going to get his firearm certificate otherwise -- that you can disclose anything? - Yes.

Now, why should that simply not be done? - Yes, you could do that. There might be something in that. There is talk of this gut feeling that something else might be there. To put that down in writing would be extremely difficult.

It is a matter for a doctor's judgement about what he can disclose within the terms of the mandate; is that not right? - Yes.

Some doctors will be more comfortable than others about disclosing certain types of information, as in any other area of human experience? - Yes. From discussion this week at the BMA, some doctors expressed the opinion that they should be conscientious objectors, as it were, and not have anything to do with the signing of applications. Now, that would create difficulties again for getting in the medical report. In that case it would have to go to an independent person, not the GP.

If we assume for the moment that there will be a form of regulation of firearms that involves the applicant obtaining a certificate, and if we assume for the moment that a person should only get a certificate if there is no obvious reason or no reason established from a medical examination why he should be regarded as unfit, then would the person who is the current general practitioner not be the doctor best placed to advise of problems? - In some respects yes, but in some respects no.

If he has not seen the patient I can understand him saying "I cannot tell you"? - Yes.

But we have heard Dr. Davies say in that situation he would have to do the job? - Yes. I think there is a case for having an independent person, not the registered medical practitioner, fulfil this role.

You mean in all cases? - In all cases, yes.

BY LORD CULLEN: How would that independent person be briefed about what the medical history was? - I think an independent practitioner would have to be briefed, but with access to medical records, in order to do that effectively.

So the GP records you would assume would be made available? - Yes.

And nothing more than that? Is there any possibility of discussing the matter with the GP? - I think we have to have the ability to discuss it with the GP as well.

In that case is there a problem? Because we were talking about a problem of consent. Even with consent there seemed to be a difficulty in the view of the existing guidelines, but what about discussion between the independent person and the GP? - I think if the original application is done with the patient's consent this removes a lot of the constraint on the individual medical practitioner.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY:
That is what he was putting forward to us? - Yes.

If that is right do you see a difficulty? Is it not caught by the strictures and the guidelines? Does it not go outside these? - Yes. The medical practitioners want to take part in the process for the sake of all individuals. They don't want to come across anything else like this. Doctors are feeling extremely strongly that in general they want to avoid the misuse of the firearms and the possession of firearms being misused. That is the over-riding factor.

You have made your position clear in your statement to the Inquiry, that you want to play your positive part in this. Can I be absolutely clear about the position of the confidential guidance? Paragraph 18 does not apply in circumstances where informed consent had been given by the patient for the disclosure of his medical history by his GP? - No, not if the patient has given his informed consent.

I/

I can see that you may in your representative capacity have difficulty for definite in speaking for all doctors today: but perhaps some of that is influenced by the views of doctors on handguns, which we should perhaps try to lay aside for the moment, and look at the problems which might be created for doctors if there remains a certification process which had to be carried out? - Yes.

Now, did your meetings this week pass any resolutions which would inhibit a doctor from participating in the process which Dr. Davies mentioned this morning? - Yes. This Motion 62 stated that "This meeting believes that doctors should not endorse gun licence applications", and if you take that to mean doing a secondary report, that would be it. But I could imagine it would not necessarily cover that.

Was that resolution related to being a counter-signatory? - It was related to the whole point of counter-signatories, yes.

But it would still have to no doubt receive the support of your membership, wouldn't it? Or do you think it is something you would have to go along with if that happened? - One problem is that this has arisen in a relatively short time scale to get full consultation. If this recommendation came out this would have to be discussed at future meetings. As it stands at the moment, it was a very small majority that carried that motion, and therefore I can foresee that a large body of the medical profession would be -- if it reflects the vote, roughly half the profession would carry out endorsing gun licences.

So this is not a motion which binds all members? - No. Because of the wording of it, really.

Now, do you have there a letter which was sent by your secretary to the Home Affairs Committee, dated 23rd April, 1996? - Yes.

On the second page of that you express concern about the relationship which is perhaps in the public perception between psychiatric illness and being a public danger with weapons. Now, is there such an obvious relationship as a layman think there/there ought to be? - Between medical illness and danger?

Yes? - Not at all. I am talking here about representing practitioners in the BMA, not as a forensic psychiatrist. I think it is very important that we do not ally mental disease necessarily with a slur which suggests that people might be a danger to the public. I think there is a complete distinction between the two, and it is very important to make that clear.

Does that not point out the importance of involving doctors in the whole process of firearms specification? - I think a very important point to remember is that the general practitioner is a generalist; he is not a specialist in the risk assessment of the danger of someone carrying weapons. The general medical practitioner who signs the form is doing that on the basis of a generalist, who does not necessarily have any specialist training. Even if he had specialist training the prediction level is very uncertain. Even at the time when this is signed it is all right, circumstances can change that afternoon or the following morning.

That is why I think no one would ever ask you anything other than to say you know of no reason why a person is not fit to be entrusted with a firearm? - That is correct.

I take it a doctor can go that far? - Yes.

You have mentioned in the next paragraph anxiety about the relevance of many conditions that doctors see to firearms fitness, and these are some cases and conditions that a layman might suppose would have relevance to the fitness to hold a firearm certificate, and one you mention there is depression? - Yes.

What is the difficulty the doctors are expressing there? - I think the problem is that it is a question of what sort of depression, how deep is the depression. Again, to lump together a range of different conditions very broadly, I think everybody here would say they had at some stage been depressed. It is a sort of comparative term.

Does/

Does that not emphasise that if we are going to look to doctors to assist at all in the process there can be no boundaries or limits to the areas they are asked to comment upon? In other words, they should if asked be able to comment on the whole medical history of the individual, insofar as they consider it relevant to the question they are dealing with? - Yes, but I think it would be fair to say that specific questions would have to be framed. It would need almost a check-list in order that you did not miss one particular aspect.

I take it you would expect the police surgeons to devise a form and then consult you about its appropriateness? - Yes.

I don't remember if I have used this expression already, but we have heard the expression used certainly by Dr. Davies and others that in the circumstances we are envisaging here you ought to err on the side of public safety. Do you agree with that? - Yes.

I think in their submissions the BMA have been anxious to stress their concern for public safety? - Yes.

You have also I think made submissions to this Inquiry through your General Medical Services Committee? - Yes, that is correct.

And one of the things you have dealt with there is the logistical difficulty you mentioned earlier, that particularly in relation to the number of psychologists and psychiatrists that would be required to do psychometric testing of applicants? - Yes.

You will appreciate today we have been looking at a slightly different arrangement, in which a police surgeon would initially screen the applicants and the psychologist and psychiatrist would only become involved if he thought that was necessary? - Yes.

Obviously that is not as ideal as the full testing, but we have heard that psychometric testing is unlikely to be of particular assistance if done on a general basis? - Yes.

Do/

Do the BMA have any views on that? - I think one would have to go back to the distinction between the generalist nature of the GP and the police surgeon and their specialist knowledge. I am sure that workload is a problem. If you can imagine a general state of awareness after tragic incidents like here, I am sure GPs would look at things in much more detail, and much more doubt would arise in their mind, and I can envisage a situation where more second opinions from forensic scientists or psychiatrists would be sought. There could be a big logistic problem.

I wonder if you could look at R67, the interim firearms guidance note which the BMA have issued: have you got that? - Yes.

Can you tell me when that was issued? - It was issued in March, 1989, and it was revised in April, 1996.

Has the revised version been issued to your members, do you know? - It is available, yes.

Is it not issued automatically? - I don't think it has been posted out to each individual member.

But if someone wants guidance, that is the guidance they get? - Yes.

I am confused about one particular part, which is paragraph 11, under the heading "Patients who may be dangerous if controlling firearms": do you see that? - Yes.

Can you read paragraph 11, which is the guidance you give to doctors at present? - "In these circumstances doctors should consider breaching confidentiality and telling the relevant officer (The Chief Constable of the County or the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police) of their disquiet. In keeping with other situations, in which a doctor may consider breaching confidentiality, doctors must be prepared to justify their decision before the GMC or a Court, if necessary. The GMC guidelines of September, 1995 on confidentiality say that rarely, cases may arise in which 'Disclosures may be necessary in the public interest where a failure to disclose information may expose/expose the patient, or others, to risk of death or serious harm. In such circumstances you should disclose information promptly to an appropriate person or authority".

So that is guidance that you have given which reflects the GMC guidelines we were looking at earlier? - Yes.

Now, separately you have commented on the checking of adults who may seek to work with children? - Yes.

And you deal with this in a letter dated 24th May, 1996? - Yes.

And you say in that that you feel at present systems for checking whether an adult should be permitted to work with children are inadequate, as it is possible for a suspected individual to move from one Authority to another, and you are suggesting the establishment of a national register of suspected persons? - Yes.

12.40 p.m.

So the principal concern there is obviously with the problem that comes when people move from one area to another, having been detected in one area possibly and moving into another one?

- Yes.

A national register of suspected persons; what do you have in mind? - Well, if I can perhaps enlarge on that?

Yes? - When this was done, the line of enquiry on what was going to happen was a little bit less sure. I think again there has to be a distinction between convicted persons, persons who have actually been convicted of some offence, and suspected persons because I think when we talk about suspected persons you are in a very grey area as to whether you suspect somebody or not and how severe the suspicion has to be before you can do something and this would be for debate. We feel that there would be some merit in having some sort of co-ordinating body who could collect, gather and accumulate information. It would have to be done on a totally confidential, very independent basis. It would of course have to be done very, very carefully and it would have to be done in such a manner that if anybody was wrongly put on such a list that there should be a way in which they can make sure that their name was completely expunged from a list of that nature.

Well, do you have in mind any way in which you could determine whether a person was satisfactorily recorded as a suspect? - Very difficult. No. It is totally prediction.

It is quite a desirable proposal you have. What I am trying to do is to establish whether there is any feasible way of implementing it? - Well, I think to err on the side of safety first. That would be one part of it.

Bearing in mind all you have said today, though, about the need for consent from patients before you disclose anything and the confidentiality guidelines you have, what you are really suggesting is a scheme which has no regard to that sort of thing at all and relies on no doubt rumour and speculation about individuals on the basis of untested/untested information? - Yes, I think one would have to make a distinction there between this sort of register not being medically driven as it were. Not necessarily based on the doctor/patient relationship. We are not talking about a doctor taking a major or a part in this. We are talking about the sort of public. I can see that that does open up a completely different type of thing.

Well, the closest we have at the moment is police intelligence? - Yes.

Which is confidential information gathered by the police from all sorts of sources? - Yes.

And there may be something to be said for making that nationally available, to the police nationally? - Yes.

I wondered if you have something else in mind beyond that and a feasible way actually to implement it which I think we are all having difficulty identifying? - No. I mean, I don't think we could come up with a blueprint to give you a scheme to do that.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. CAMPBELL: Do you still have before you the submission to the Home Affairs Committee of the 23rd of April, 1996? - Yes, indeed.

I think you were asked in the course of your evidence-in-chief for the purposes of the questions you were being asked to put to one side the more general position adopted by the BMA in relation to these matters. I wonder whether it is possible to do that for these purposes. So let me approach the matter in this way. If we look at the second page of that document, the third-last paragraph, the last paragraph at the foot of the page, we read "In the absence of any clear scientific evidence upon which to base discrimination between persons who are and persons who are not likely to behave anti-socially while in the possession of firearms, it follows that any firearms policy needs to take account of the fact that in the present state of knowledge it is not possible from a medical viewpoint to assist in any real way with the prediction of those positively safe with firearms, nor those who are unsafe". Now, does/does that point of view play any part in the BMA's response to the suggestion that G.P.'s should be brought into the licensing process in a more direct fashion than they are at present? - Yes, it does because I think, as I said earlier, G.P.'s by their position are felt to have an extra knowledge which a generalist would not necessarily possess and that knowledge itself of forensic prediction is in itself an imperfect science. Very large margins of error are possible.

My learned friend, Mr. Bonomy, puts to you that this problem can be resolved by ensuring that the general practitioner is simply asked "Do you know of any reason why this person should not be given a Firearms Certificate?" as opposed to "Is it all right for this person to have a Firearms Certificate?"? - Yes.

Well, no doubt sitting round this table and thinking about it we can readily appreciate the difference between these two questions and the answers to them but is there a concern that these differences may not be appreciated by everybody up the chain in the decision-making process? - There is concern amongst medical practitioners in general about that position, yes.

Is there a risk that any certificate by a general practitioner will be misinterpreted as a green light? - I think there is that risk and that is the reason why, when it was discussed this week, a large body of general practitioners or practitioners were concerned about doctors entering into this process.

So does that have a further knock-on effect upon how a G.P. would assess what he was being asked to do? In other words, would he approach the matter on the basis of well, never mind what the actual question is, I have to bear in mind that the mere fact that I am being asked to answer this question and to put my name to this application may in some minds give the application a legitimacy which strictly it ought not to have for the reasons that we have read in your report? - Yes.

And then the G.P. is in a very difficult position because you have told us that he cannot reliably, positively, certify that person X will never/never act inappropriately with a firearm? - That is correct, yes.

So still on that paragraph that I was reading from before, do the considerations which we have just been discussing lead at least in part to what we read in the rest of that paragraph, "Our conclusion, sadly, is that until such time as methods are developed to provide reliable predictions, firearms policy needs to be based on the understanding that from time to time unpredictable behaviour will occur? - Yes.

And if we look at the letter which was sent to Mrs. McKeane on the 24th of May, 1996, do these considerations play any part in the view expressed in the short third paragraph on the first page of that letter, that the BMA would like to reiterate the point made to the Home Affairs Committee that members of the public should not be permitted to possess handguns personally? - Yes, the point made was that persons possessing them and retaining them was a risk.

Now, as the BMA points out in the remainder of that paragraph, whether that risk and tragedies such as Dunblane will be the price which should be paid in allowing legal access to firearms is something upon which presumably views will differ but the BMA recommends that the Government considers further tightening of the regulations? - Yes. If I can add again that there was another discussion at the meeting in Brighton and a motion was passed by a very large majority that it should be illegal for private individuals to use or possess automatic or semi-automatic weapons or handguns other than in establishments licensed for that purpose.

So bearing that in mind, is there another concern on the part of doctors that they might be asked to perform the impossible in effect? - There is a very considerable concern, yes.

And asked to do this in a context which might simply be facilitating something which they regard as inherently undesirable? - Yes.

And I take it doctors are fairly hard pressed, overworked individuals I suppose? - Yes. I think also you have to bear in mind that doctors themselves/themselves form a very wide group in society and some will own guns themselves and have gun licences and some will be at the other end of the spectrum and don't recognise that anybody should hold a weapon.

Conscientious objectors? - Yes.

RE-EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMOY: When you are asked to complete a medical examination and report in relation to insurance, are you giving a positive declaration that the subject will survive for a number of years? - I would have to say that I'm not a general practitioner. That is not my specialist subject at all but I have signed these forms as part of doing locum work. From my recall of that, you are actually signing to medical details and examination and I don't think an opinion is formed by the person filling in that form. That is performed by the company itself.

So you are answering details of what? - Details of the patients, their height, weight and previous medical history. The forms vary in their complexity. There are some simple ones but there are more detailed ones where they want a full medical examination, a sounding of the chest, blood pressure and a test of urine.

So you don't have to say whether there is any reason why a person should be denied insurance? All you do is answer straightforward factual questions? - I think again it depends on which type of form. They will be formed to different degrees. In some forms you would be asked to say there is no reason to believe. Some of them are just simply certificates where you just fill in and corroborate the details.

What I want to know is why a doctor may have difficulty in understanding the difference between saying positively that a person is a suitable and reliable person to have a gun and saying on the other hand that he knows of no reason why he should be declared unfit? Why should the doctor have particular difficulty understanding the difference between these two? - The difficulty between saying that the patient is unfit or saying that he knows no reason why not?

No, saying he is positively fit and ought to be given one and on the other hand saying you know of no reason why he should be regarded as unfit to have one? - Well, the difficulty there is that sanity or ability to do something is not a finite thing.

No, I understand that but why should a doctor find difficulty in understanding the difference between these two propositions? I am not suggesting you determine his sanity for all time? - I am sorry, can you repeat the point?

Well, you have just said to Mr. Campbell that there is some perceived difficulty amongst doctors. Well, I see heads shaking. I seem to have misunderstood this but I got the impression you were indicating that doctors felt they would be giving a positive endorsement seeking a gun licence if they answered any medical questions about him? - Yes, I think the point was, wasn't it, that the doctor by giving that was seen to be giving an extra type of endorsement, an extra approval.

I can understand that in the counter-signatory area but what Mr. Campbell then moved on to, away from the counter-signatory, forget about that, was into the area of the medical history of the individual being disclosed to a police surgeon. Now, where is the difficulty there that doctors would feel about somehow or other giving a positive approval to the applicant? - Well, I think the doctor would always feel a difficulty, even if he was trained in forensic psychiatry because it is a very inexact science. To give a positive approval that somebody is fit is an extremely difficult thing to do and a generalist couldn't do it.

I'm not suggesting that. All I am saying is that if you are posed with some questions about a person's physical fitness and these questions are designed to establish whether you know of any reason why he should be declared unfit and you answer these questions, how is that seen as giving some sort of positive approval of the person as being fit for the next five years to hold a licence? - Well, that is the thing. It would depend on what the form was you were actually filling in and signing. It is agreed you could only do it at that time and not reasons in the past. There is no difficulty about that./

that. The difficulty is a feeling amongst doctors that the fact a medical person has done that gives some extra substance to it. That is the point I was trying to make.

But is that you referring again to the counter-signatory? - Yes, the counter-signatory.

I am trying to get away from the counter-signature and to ask you about providing information to a police surgeon? - Yes.

Now, if you provide information which is factual and all you are additionally asked is to say that you know of no reason why the person should be regarded as unfit at present, at this minute, unfit, where do you see a difficulty? - No, I don't see a difficulty with that.

After/

2.00 p.m

After an adjournment for lunch.

LORD CULLEN: Yes, Mr. Bonomy?

MR. BONOMY: The next witness, sir, is Robert Moir.

ROBERT MOIR (52) Sworn

EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMY: Are you Robert Moir? - Yes.

Sergeant? - I am now Acting Inspector.

With Central Scotland Police? - Central Scotland Police.

What age are you? - 52.

And how long have you been with Central Scotland Police? - 25 years.

What was the first you ever heard of Thomas Hamilton? - Back in 1979. I was transferred down from Lochearnhead to Stirling and I heard him being discussed in general terms within the office, that there was some innuendo and suggestions that he may have been involved with young children, but there was nothing concrete.

Do you remember who was making the enquiry? - I think it was D.S. or D.C. Kindness at the time.

Did you speak to him about Hamilton? - Just in general terms.

Did you know whether anything was established at that time? - As far as I was aware, I was told that there was nothing concrete at all, nothing.

We have heard evidence from Kindness that he put an entry on the Intelligence system about that time. Were you aware of that? - No.

Did/

Did you know that Hamilton had a shop in Cowane Street in Stirling? - It wasn't until after a few years after that that I heard that he had a shop in Cowane Street.

After 1979, when was the next contact you had with him? - It was when I had become Chairman of the Dunblane Community Centre Council, which was responsible for the letting of the community halls within Dunblane, and he ran a youth club.

Was that a Council that dealt with letting within Dunblane High School? - High School, and the Braeport Centre.

Beside it? - No; the Braeport Centre is at a different part of the town.

So you dealt with both? - I dealt with both at that time.

When did you first go on to that Council? - I think it would be about '81/'82, round about then.

And were you working in Dunblane at that time? - Yes.

Were you stationed in Dunblane? - I was stationed in Dunblane.

So when did you first move to Dunblane? - I actually stayed in Dunblane when I moved down from Lochearnhead in 1977, but I worked in Stirling for a year and then I moved back up to Dunblane to work.

Do you still live in Dunblane? - Yes.

And have you lived there since you moved there from Lochearnhead? - I have.

Did you become Chairman as soon as you went on to that Council? - No.

When did you become Chairman? - That would probably be a couple of years after that.

In what capacity did you understand you were taking up office on that Council? - It was after/

after I went to Dunblane, they received a letter from the Youth and Community Officer who was based in the Braeport Centre, a full-time Council employee. They wrote to the police asking if they could send a policeman along to be part of the Committee dealing with the youth of Dunblane.

And you were sent along? - They asked for volunteers. I have been involved with youth groups before, so I volunteered to do it.

And when do you reckon it was you first encountered Hamilton in that connection? - He never turned up at the meetings. He would only occasionally turn up at the AGMs more or less and that would be it.

Was he on the Council? - Each user group had a representative. That was how the Council was made up, of user groups.

So when did you first meet him again, or when did you first meet him? - I believe it would be about May. That's when we usually held our AGM, so probably about '82, '83, round about there.

Did you do any checking on him at that stage? - No, because I had heard that he had been involved just prior to that with the Ombudsman for the Council and won his case, but I didn't actually do any checks on him at that time.

So it was after the Ombudsman episode that you came across him in person? - Yes.

You can take it that it was probably into 1985? - I heard it was going on, but I was never actually spoken to about this with the Ombudsman at all.

So you didn't make any further enquiry with Kindness for example to check up on him? - No.

You would be aware though on the Council that he was running or was anxious to run, rather, clubs within the High School? - He was, yes.

Do you know whether, when you first went on the Council, he was actually doing that, and it stopped after you went on the Council? - I believe he/

he was started because it was the policy of the Council that the youth clubs got priority of lets over anyone else, adult groups.

But we know his lets were suspended for a period? -
Yes, and shortly after that, they came back on, but it was the full-time leader more or less dealt with the lets at that time and it was only when any problems arose he would maybe raise it at an AGM or meeting.

But can you remember whether, when you first came on the Council, he was actually using premises? - I think that was the period he was stopped.

Who was the person responsible for deciding whether or not a group should get the use of either part of the school or the Braeport Centre? - At that time it was the full-time Youth and Community Officer.

Who was he? - Jim Gardiner at that time.

And preference had to be given to youth groups over adult groups? - That is correct.

After Hamilton won his case with the Ombudsman, how did the matter arise with the Council? - There was very little said about it other than he had went and he had to get the lets, which were granted, and I believe it was a Thursday night he got an hour and a half or two hours.

When the club resumed, did he advertise it? - Yes, there were letters went round.

Did you get one? - Yes.

Was there any anxiety among local people at that stage about resuming the club? - There was one -- I got several phone calls from residents, but I had spoken to someone and he said there was still nothing concrete against him.

Do you know who you spoke to? - I think it was the Criminal Intelligence Officer at the time, but I can't remember exactly who it was at that time.

And/

And what were the phone calls you were getting about? - Asking "This chap running the youth club, is it all right? We have heard a lot of stories about him".

What was your reply to that? - I said "To my knowledge I don't believe he has been convicted of anything", and left it at that.

Were you yourself running a club in Dunblane High School at that time? - Yes.

When did that start? - I got involved -- just after I went on to this group in '81, '82, I went along to help. They were short of leaders. It was a Monday night for younger children up to about 13 years of age, and I got involved with them, and it was about a year or two after that the older ones -- we started a Tuesday club which was for children from 14 up to 17, and they were running short of leaders so I went on and started running that.

So were you running both? - No, only the Tuesday club. I left the Monday club and went on to the Tuesday one.

Are you still running the Tuesday club? - No, I stopped.

How long ago was that? - Just over a year ago.

Did the Monday one continue? - Yes.

Did it do activities similar to those Hamilton claimed to be doing? - No, I wouldn't say we did the same.

What sort of activities were they? - They were doing like art work, handicrafts, as well as some gym, but the gym work wouldn't be physical training as such. It would be more like playing football, hockey, indoor hockey.

You moved to Balfron as an officer; when was that? - It would be about '85/'86; no, it was after that.

Roughly? - Yes, roughly about there.

Did/

Did you stay on in the position of Chairman of the Council? - Yes.

You encountered Hamilton in connection with your service at Balfron? - That is correct.

And that related to the camp at Loch Lomond in 1988? - Yes.

Between his getting the lets back in 1985 and 1988, was there anything happened in the running of his club that caused the Council concern? - No.

Tell me how you encountered him in 1988? - I was at Dunblane and we got a call from Dumbarton Police.

Were you at Balfron? - I was stationed at Balfron at the time, the Sergeant there, and we got a complaint this camp was being run for youths by a chap Tommy Hamilton, but they didn't say where he had come from. I didn't relate it was the same Tommy Hamilton I had known from Dunblane at that time, and he just said "We've got some complaints; they are out on one of the islands; could you send two officers out to check the island and the camp and see what it's like and report back", so there was a PC Gunn and a PC Sloan -- no, Duncan -- Sloan is her married name, and they both went, and reported back what they saw.

Have you any recollection of what their view of the camp was when they came back? - When they spoke about it when they left I said "Well, try and look at it how you feel with your own children". PC Gunn had children, but PC Duncan didn't have any so I said "Try and look at your own boys going to a summer camp, how would you find it and react if your own boys were at the camp", and left it at that, and they came back and said it wasn't the worst; they seemed to be running about; they were quite cold, in shorts all the time.

Their report would have to go back to Strathclyde Police? - That is correct.

Were you aware of action taken by Strathclyde Police? - Yes; they phoned us up and I made some enquiry. They phoned up again and told me they had done it, roughly a brief description of what/what had happened over the phone, and I was told by PC Hood where Mr. Hamilton was at this time.

Were you alerted to the fact that Strathclyde Police made arrangements for parents to come if they wanted to take their children home? - I didn't know that until later on. I was doing split shifts and I had left after a while quite early in the evening as I was coming back out at night.

But around that time, did you learn that? - Yes.

And you learned about the children being taken from a cinema? - The next day they arranged to go, they said they were going out to the island, and never told us. It was the boatman that contacted us, but Hamilton had left with the boys.

Now, /

Now, we have heard evidence of a complaint against Constables Duncan and Gunn which arose out of this incident. Were you roped into that complaint? - Yes.

To what extent? - I believe we had a committee meeting of the Centre Council just after it, shortly after that, and Hamilton came up to me and said "You are at Balfron now I understand", and I said "That is right". He said "You will know about my complaint". I said "What complaint?" and he said "P.C. Gunn put in a bad report about me. What is in the report?" and I said "It is sub judice. I can't discuss it". Thereafter he kept phoning my house virtually daily.

What was his purpose in so doing? - He wanted to know what the contents of the statements were that were made by P.C.s Gunn and Duncan so he could sue the police for breaking up his camp. He said he had lost money -- he said he had lost his camp, it had cost him money, because he had to give money back to the boys.

Did he write to you at all? - Numerous letters.

About what? - About the camps, complaints. Every letter he sent to various persons, I got a copy of it.

There is no sign you were formally complained about, but was your understanding that he did complain about you? - He did complain about me.

What did he complain about you in relation to? - He went into Headquarters. He phoned one day shortly after asking if he could come and speak to me again. I said "I have nothing to speak to you about. I can't discuss it. It is sub judice". He said "I will need to speak to you about something else". This was a Saturday, and I said "If you call about 1 o'clock I should be free, saving anything unforeseen happening". Now, unfortunately a couple of incidents arose at Dunblane at that time, and I had to attend to them, and I didn't get back till 4 in the afternoon. He thought I was evading him, and he went in and complained/complained about me.

But there was never any formal police procedure about you? - No.

When he contacted you did he ever try to justify himself? - Yes, he tried to say he was running good youth clubs, he was a responsible person.

Did he ever show you documents to try and justify himself? - Yes, he heard that some of the children were alleging there was a lack of food. On one occasion he was in my house -- I had been out to call at Dunblane for mail, and I just phoned my wife and said I would be back in five or ten minutes. In the interim he arrived in my house to speak to me. My wife told him to come in. When I arrived home he was in the house. I wasn't very pleased about that. He tried to discuss it, and I told him I was not discussing it. He went on about the food. He produced a bill he had got from one of the supermarkets "See the good I bought for the kids. That shows you how much I paid". I said "That doesn't prove anything". I looked at it, and near the bottom was an item for two or three cans of beer. I said "Were you buying drink for the kids as well?" and he just snatched it back from me and put it in his pocket.

There were suggestions to this Inquiry that he was a tee-totaller? - I have never known him to have a drink; but it was certainly on the itemised bill.

Did it get to the point where he was making complaints about the police persecuting him and associating you with these complaints? - Yes, just about simply rumours. Every year he would put round letters about his youth club in Dunblane saying he was also a photographer, and he had been involved with the police at Loch Lomond at his camps.

Did he ever show you photographs? - He did some, and he also invited me to the camps, "I will show you videos", which I also understand he went into headquarters and spoke about as well.

What about the photographs he showed you?/

you? - It was just photographs of a camp in Loch Lomond.

Now, did there come a stage when the arrangements for letting the premises were changed? - Yes.

When was that? - Just about three years ago now.

What was changed? - There was a new management in the Council's Youth and Community policy, and the female that took over though it was up to the committee to agree the lets, not the full-time officer.

That was Jackie Cowan? - Yes.

She followed Mr. Gardiner? - No, Mr. Sutherland came after Mr. Gardiner.

She had his job? - Yes.

She decided the Council should negotiate the lets? - Yes.

Hamilton started having camps at the high school? - That is correct.

Do you know when he started that? - I think that was the year after he did his Loch Lomond one. They were stopped. I believe they would not allow him back on the island. He applied for a camp and was given it.

How many camps do you reckon he had in Dunblane High School? Over how many years? - I think three or four.

Did you go to any of them? - Yes.

How many? - On two of the years I was up and I attended. He asked me to attend to make sure everything was okay, to pop in any time, which I did, in and out of uniform. I would just walk in initially when I was out walking as well.

Do you know what years you visited his camps, what two years? - Say about three years ago and the year before.

Did/

Did you go more than once in each year? - Yes.

Was there anything wrong about what was he was doing on these occasions? - No, I couldn't see anything wrong.

What about the dress of the kids? - When they were in the gym -- I also dropped in when he was running his youth club on a Thursday night. He also asked me to go to this. In the gym they were all just dressed in shorts and trainers, and they were running about doing keep-fit, exercising, running, and there was nothing I could see that was wrong other than that all the boys were always stripped to the waist. His idea, however, was that they were always sweaty, and it was to stop them getting dirty.

Were you concerned about the fact they had nothing on on top? - No, because there was a parent -- because I stayed in Dunblane they all knew who I was, the locals and the parents, and one or two spoke to me about it, and one of the parents of one of the boys went along quite regularly to it just to make sure everything was okay, because his son wanted to go, and he wanted to make sure there was going to be nothing untoward happening.

Did the amount of interest in these clubs and camps from Dunblane residents decline? - Yes, the number of pupils dropped until at the end just before I finished with it he was bussing kids in from Balfron.

Now, there was a dispute we have heard about in relation to the let he got for one of the camps being interrupted in part by a let to another group. Can you tell us something about that? - To the Quakers' Church group?

Yes? - Yes.

Could you tell us something about that? - We had agreed we would be the ones responsible for the lets. Since the Loch Lomond incident he turned up at nearly every meeting we had. Prior to that he was very seldom there. It was discussed, and one of the Quakers, who was also a committee member, said "Could we have a let for the Sunday School?/"

School? We finish by half past 12", and he objected, and I said "I thought you only used the kitchen down at the other end of the school, not in the community wing?", and he committee agreed they could get it on a Sunday up till half past 12, this community wing, where there is a small kitchen with one cooker. I don't think he was present at that meeting -- or was he? I can't recall now.

Yes? - Anyway, I got a telephone call shortly after it from him objecting to us cutting his hours on a Sunday because of this church group. He said every year which passed the church group stopped taking their services on a Sunday, and I said I wasn't aware of that at all. I said "Put it in writing, and we will discuss it". He went to his councillor and the next thing I was told it was granted.

He went to more than his councillor, did he not? - Apparently he always went through this councillor, then it went through the Education Committee.

Who was the councillor? - Ball.

Was that issue ever resolved? - Yes, it was taken off our hands. We understand the let was granted the previous year, which Miss Jackie Cowan had not told us about.

We may see in the correspondence that he had been asked to apply yet again shortly before the camp began? - We did not know he had applied.

So there were two separate lets at different specified times? - Yes.

Now, was that the only major issue of complaint he had at the Council? - He always thought we were against him, trying to cut his hours. I think the previous year on a Thursday evening one of the adult badminton groups approached us and said "He is finishing early on a Thursday night. Is there any chance of us getting half an hour of his time so we can run a junior badminton club?". We spoke to the janitor of the school, who said he was leaving early. In fact I went up on one occasion, and he had gone about half an hour prior to his let terminating. It was therefore discussed/discussed at the next meeting.

Yes? - Before we had the next meeting I got in touch with Jackie Cowan. I said "You better check with the Council's Legal Department, because you know what Hamilton is like and we will get letters of complaint about this". He always told us about him winning his case with the Ombudsman against the Region.

So that is another problem for him relating to the time he was being allocated in the High School? - Yes.

Any other complaints? - The only other thing was, he was accountable to no one. He charged so much a night. Other people that were running youth clubs, like judo and dancing, they had to pay for their lets. Even the churches paid for lets, but Hamilton got his free.

Was this because it was a youth club? - It was a private club. The youth clubs on a Monday night and a Tuesday night had to produce books and accounts to the Council: they got to look at the books and everything else. Hamilton was accountable to no one.

Yes? - Initially he was charging 50p per night per boy. When he started his youth club he was getting 60 or 70 boys there, and 60 or 70 at 50p is a lot of money.

Were you aware of a policy of discouraging his youth premises if alternative uses could be found? - No. We were always told it had to be for youth, that youth had to have the priority. Other groups were told -- as the years went on we got busier. Now, between 7 and 10 is the busiest time for these community halls to be used, and we had to turn down other groups.

Did your Council consult the Legal Department at all? - Only when we stopped his half hour meeting, or reduced it by half an hour. We contacted him regarding that. That was done through the full-time youth leader.

So throughout the time you were associated with the Council was the policy or attitude that if Hamilton/

Hamilton applied and the premises were available he would get them? - Yes.

Did you ever hear any positive information about him on which you as a police officer might have acted to try to stop his activities? - No.

You went on to the Council as a police representative. Did you remain throughout your period as a police representative? - No. At the very end after all the complaints and letters going back and forwards from Hamilton to the Chief Constable, 18 months or two years ago I was told to say I was not a police officer.

Do you know why that was? - No, I never got a satisfactory answer yet.

I would like you to look at one or two documents. The first is D83/K, which I think we have: do you have that? - Yes.

Can you see that is a letter dated 16th January, 1991 to the then new Chief Constable, William Wilson? - Yes.

Does it mention there at the second page of the first paragraph "In fact, when your officers eventually visited the camp on Wednesday, 20th July, 1998, even their sergeant, Bob Moir, and their Inspector, Mike Mill, did not know that they were visiting our camp or their whereabouts"? - Yes.

Can you confirm the impression from your evidence that you sent Gunn and Duncan to the camp? - Yes, we said it was on this island in Loch Lomond.

But you sent them? - Yes. The phone call came in. It was the girl that took it. I spoke to them, and they left to go.

You will see in the last paragraph he described what happened as "An arbitrary condemnation of our 1988 summer camp by your officers, without knowing or checking the facts", and he says ".....it was a deliberate and malicious attempt to cause maximum disruption and damage to our group, which it did"? - Yes.

Now, /

Now, that doesn't sound as though that is what you had in mind? - No. I explained to them just to go and see it "Treat it as if your own child was there" to P.C. Gunn. That is the only way I believe you can do it, because everyone has different standards.

I would be grateful if you would look at the Minutes of the Council, DDH29, the Minutes of the 12th May, 1994: have you got them? - Yes.

You appear as one of the persons attending Dunblane Centre Council Annual General Meeting. Do you see that? - Yes.

Look to item 5, the name of the Council changed at that meeting to Dunblane High School Wing Council? - Yes.

Do they still seem to be responsible for Braeport Centre? - No. What happened here is that -- we have a lack of facilities in Dunblane. We have been pushing for a new community centre through the Region for a number of years, and we had an open meeting in the Victoria Halls in Dunblane, and it was agreed that a Steering Committee would be set up to look at the possibilities of sites, costs and that type of thing, which was done. When this was done, Jackie Cowan and her superiors decided themselves that we would have to split the Council, with the Dunblane Centre Council looking after the Braeport and the Dunblane High School Wing Council being responsible for the Community Education Wing at the high school, which was two different identities. This new Steering Group which was set up to look after the new community centre took over the running of the Braeport.

2.40 p.m.

But this meeting would be after you had already decided that it was the Council who were responsible for dealing with lets, is that correct? - It was just about this time it then became the responsibility of the Council to deal with lets.

Then if you look at DFU27 which is a series of four letters all dated 30th May. You will see the first of these is to Michael Forsyth? - Yes.

And the Heading is "1994 Summer Camp 10th-24th July 1994", is that right? - Yes.

And the letter is signed Thomas Hamilton? - Yes.

And this is about this problem you have just mentioned about the let for that camp, is that correct? - Yes.

Do you see in the second paragraph he says "It comes as no surprise to me that a member of Central Scotland Police has been involved in this. Central Scotland Police have taken every arbitrary opportunity to disrupt our camps and Clubs all, in my view, as part of an ongoing conspiracy". Is that what he says? - Yes.

Now, were you in any way involved in trying to disrupt his camp when that decision was taken? - No.

And in the next paragraph he says "I have spoken to the police representative who signed the restriction to ask why such a last minute decision was taken". Now, that would be a reference to him speaking to you? - Yes, this was raised. As I said, Jackie Cowan had agreed that we would now be responsible for the lets and this let came in and we changed it. Well, the Church group would have it on a Sunday morning up to 12.30.

But all I want to confirm is this is you he is referring to?
- Yes.

And he did speak to you about it, is that right? - Yes.

And/

And you tried to explain it to him? - Yes.

And he didn't accept the explanation basically? - Yes, that is correct.

Can you confirm he also at the same time wrote to Mrs. Cowan setting out his case? - Yes.

And that he also wrote to the Commissioner for Local Administration in Scotland, affectionately known as the Ombudsman? - Yes.

And that he also wrote to the Chief Executive of Central Regional Council? - Yes.

To state his case to each of these people? - Yes.

All on the 30th May, is that right?
- Yes.

Now, would you look please at D196K which is a memo. It may be there separately. It is dated the 1st June 1994 from the Depute Chief Constable to Inspector Barker. It is also DCD229. Now, you will see that is a short memo from the Depute Chief Constable to Inspector Barker at Dunblane dated 1st June. Do you see that? - Yes.

And we can take it that some of the last correspondence I have just referred to had reached the Depute Chief Constable's hands and he is asking "Can you assure me that Bob Moir is involved in Dunblane High School as a private citizen and not as a police officer" and does that date the time at which you have a change in status? - Yes.

And if you look at D197, the next item, do we see Inspector Barker's reply? - Yes.

Now, if you look at the second page of that, does it say "The allegations made and aspersions cast by Hamilton regarding a police conspiracy in respect of this matter appears to be totally without foundation in that Sergeant Moir was acting in a completely voluntary capacity"? - That is wrong. I told him. I said I was asked to go along as a police representative a number of years previous and when I moved away from Dunblane to/

to other stations I phoned the various different inspectors who took over in Dunblane and I explained to them who I was and what I did and I said "Do you want to send someone else or do you wish me to carry on?" and they just said "Carry on yourself and keep on doing it". When I saw this I said "You are just going to get another letter back from Hamilton". When I saw that.

Well, you don't need a crystal ball for that one. If you look at D200K you will see that Inspector Barker there confirms that you had undertaken to make it clear in the future that you were there as a private citizen? - That is correct.

And you did undertake to do that, is that right? - Yes.

Now, can you look please at a letter which I think has been copied for everyone which is DDH308. It is dated 10th June 1994 and is from Central Scotland Police to Councillor Ball. It's the last sentence in the second paragraph of that letter "My Sergeant Moir, who is involved in a wide range of community work in the area, has been the Chairman of this body for more than 10 years, but purely as private citizen, not in his capacity as a police officer"? - That is right.

That is not your understanding? - No.

And that is signed by Mr. McMurdo, is that right? - Yes. I got copies of these letters sent as well. Every letter that Hamilton received or sent, he sent me copies and whenever I saw this I explained it to the Inspector. I said "That's wrong".

If you look now at the letter of the 16th June from Mr. Hamilton to Councillor Ball which is DFU29. Do you see in the second paragraph there that Hamilton says to Councillor Ball "I have to say that contrary to their letter....." -- that is the police letter we have just looked at -- "..... Sergeant Moir is and has always been clearly defined in Minutes etc. over some 10 years or more as being the police representative and not 'purely as a private citizen, not in his capacity as a police officer'"? - That is correct.

So/

So you and Hamilton are at one on that, is that right?

- Yes.

I think in the last paragraph of that letter he thanks Councillor Ball for his interest in this further unfortunate matter, is that right? Does he say "I thank you most sincerely for your interest in this further unfortunate matter and your kind help in other related matters"? - Yes, that is right. "I thank you most sincerely".

"I thank you most sincerely for your interest in this further unfortunate matter and your kind help in other related matters"? - Yes.

Go back to the front page of that letter and tell me what the heading is at the very top? - "Boys' Sports Club Group Committee".

And Thomas W. Hamilton, Group Chairman? - That is right. Well, he said he was.

That is what it says? - Yes.

Now, go to the second sentence in the last paragraph and read it please? - "Both the Committee and myself are, as always, impressed with your competence, honesty, integrity, sense of fair play and dedication to all of your constituents. In my own findings over many years of practical experience, these qualities are unfortunately not found among officers of Central Scotland Police -- in fact, quite the opposite!".

But he is writing there on behalf of "The Committee and myself"? - Yes, that is correct.

Now, attached to that there are copies of Minutes in 1992 where you are designed as Chairman/Police or Police/Chairman? - Yes, that is the police representative chairman but I also could have signed, with me running the Youth Club at the time, I was a representative from the Youth Club because as I said earlier, I was a representative of the different groups which made up the Committee of the Centre Council.

I think it would be fair to say, though, that this sort of petty problem was meat and drink to/

to Mr. Hamilton? - Yes.

And it indeed gets on to the agenda of the Council and if you look at DDH311, which is a Minute of a Council Meeting on the 28th June 1994, and look at Item 6. Do we see there that the problem over the let was raised at the meeting, is that right? - Yes.

Now, was it a question of resolving responsibility for the lets or was it a complaint by Hamilton that brought it on to the agenda? - Not only Hamilton raised it. It was only raised with others because the School Boards then took over and we were left with the problem of conflict. Were the School Boards letting out the rooms and were they responsible as they were responsible for the school and also were we then responsible. It was to avoid any clashes. You know, avoid double bookings etc.

Now, can you look please at letter DFU30 which is a letter of the 5th June from Hamilton to Councillor Ball and if you look at the second paragraph do we see there that the issue is not going to go away where he says "Robert Moir's role on the Centre Council has suddenly switched from Police Representative to Senior Youth Club Representative and not as 'purely a private citizen'. Indeed under the Chairmanship of Robert Moir this incompetent action is one of a series of decisions which has undermined my group on an arbitrary basis"? - Yes, that was when the initial letter went in. I said that I have been representative as far as I have been aware when I first went along to these Centre Council meetings and it was only when I was told I had to stop I said "Well, I am also representative for the Youth Group".

Now, we could spend many enjoyable moments going through the rest of the correspondence and Minutes about this but to no particular effect. Can you tell me whether you got to the stage ever of saying as a Council "Hamilton is not getting our premises"? - No, we never ever said that.

Did you ever get to the stage of being so concerned even about him that you debated whether or not he should get the premises? - No.

Was/

Was your Council privy to information that was causing it at any stage concern about his having the premises? Concern as a Council? - No.

Well, did you know anything else about Thomas Hamilton that you think might be of assistance to the Inquiry? - The only thing, as I said earlier, was that he was accountable to no one and I think with Youth Clubs, whoever is doing it should be accountable to someone.

You have been identified as a person that a number of people are concerned should give evidence to the Inquiry because they are worried that perhaps we are not getting all the information we should be getting so I invite you to tell me anything you know that you think the Inquiry ought to know about Hamilton? - Nothing other than this.

No cross-examination.

KATHERINE MARY ANDERSON (59), Sworn:

EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMY: I think you stay in Dunblane? - I do.

And we have already heard evidence from your husband who is Ewan Anderson? - That is right.

When did you first know Thomas Hamilton? - Well, I can't really remember the exact dates but I think it was in 1982.

How did you get to know him? - Through his association with my husband.

What was his connection with your husband? - It was the rifle shooting.

And was your husband a member of the Dunblane Rifle Club? - Yes. Well, he was. He isn't now.

He was at the time? - Yes.

Did/

Did Hamilton become a visitor to your home? - Yes.

Was he a frequent visitor? - Not to begin with. It was usually once a week.

And was that connected with going to the rifle Club? - I couldn't really tell you if it was or not. I don't think it was, no.

In your statement you indicated that he started coming to the house on Friday nights before and after going to the rifle range. Is that not right? - I thought it was Thursday nights. I don't think it was a Friday. My husband doesn't shoot on a Friday.

But was it in connection with going to the rifle Club that he came to the house? - I don't think so.

Well, can you remember in what connection it was? - Well, I think he started coming because of the connection with the rifle Club but it was just a friendly call to begin with.

Did you actually on any occasion visit a boat he had at Loch Lomond? - Once I think. Twice maybe.

So how friendly were you around that time? - Well, as I say, I think he called about once a week.

Did he ask you and your husband to help him in connection with this Boys' Club? - He asked us if.....he was thinking of forming a Committee and he asked us if we would go on the Committee.

Did he tell you why he was forming a Committee? - I don't think so. I think he just said that he was starting up the Boys' Club again and he was forming a Committee.

Did you have family at that stage? - Yes.

Boys or girls? - Girls.

What were their ages at that time? -

In/

In 1982 one of them would be 11 and the other one nine.

Now, that is when you first got to know him. Could it have been a bit later than that that the question of helping out with his Club arose? - Yes, much later than that.

Could that have been in 1984? - Well, I can't remember if it was 1984 or 1985 but it was when he got the let renewed to start up the Boys' Club again, Dunblane Boys' Club. I think it was probably 1985 but I'm not sure of the date.

Now, did you agree to help him? - Well, he said that he was trying to form a Committee and could we go to a meeting about forming a Committee which we went to.

Where was that meeting? - In his house.

Do/

3 p.m.

Do you remember who else was at the meeting? -
Yes. Do you want names?

Yes, please? - There was Mr. Williams. At the time I gave my statement I thought he was at the meeting, but when I discussed it with my husband I thought Mr. and Mrs. Williams were there, but it was only Mr. Williams, because I couldn't remember; it was so long ago.

Is that Mr. James Williams? - Yes.

Had you met him at that time? - No, I hadn't met him before that.

Who else was there? - Mrs. McFarlane, my husband, myself, and there was another lady there who at the moment I can't remember her name, and Mr. Hamilton was there. I think that was all, but I am not very sure.

What was decided? - It was decided that these people there would form the Committee.

Did you have a particular position on the Committee?
- Yes, I agreed to be Secretary.

What was the Committee called? - The Committee?

Or the club? - It was just the Committee.

What was the club called? - The Dunblane Boys'
Club.

Was there a discussion about the activities of the club? - I presume so. I can't remember.

Was there a discussion about why this Committee was being formed? - It was because a new club, the Dunblane Boys' Club, was starting up.

Were you aware at that stage of some difficulty Mr. Hamilton had encountered about running his club at Dunblane High School? - Yes.

Were/

Were you aware the Committee had something to do with trying to resolve that difficulty? - I think we were made aware at that meeting that he was getting the let renewed from the Council.

So you knew he had lost it? - Yes.

Did you know you were on the Committee to give some sort of either control or respectability to his club? - You mean at that time?

Yes? - No, not at that meeting. We were just asked to form a Committee, which we agreed to.

He didn't tell you he needed a Committee for the Council to agree to reinstate his let? - No.

Did you have to attend any official meeting as a result of being on this Committee? - Yes, we were told that night we agreed to form a Committee that the Council would like to meet the Committee, which we did. We went to the Council Chambers, and we went to that meeting, those people I have already mentioned.

What happened there? - I can't remember everything that happened, but I remember the Council saying they were putting a certain onus on the Committee to see it was run properly.

So by this time you knew there were particular reasons why he needed a Committee? - Well, I would think any club would have a Committee.

But here you have a club which gets a Committee, and the first thing it has to do is go and meet the Council? - I thought that was because of the rumours that had gone before.

What were the rumours about? - As far as I was aware, the boys' club he had had before, which was called the Rover Club, I understand the Scout movement had objected to the name because of the Rover Scouts, and that club had been disbanded. I had heard a couple of rumours by then.

I don't want you to give me any names of boys, but what were the rumours? - I heard two rumours; that on one occasion two boys had been left/left on the island with just a tin of mince to eat, and the other one was that one boy had been left with either a tin of mince or a tin of beans.

Had you heard any stories about kids being homesick? - One of the boys I mentioned -- I knew the boy and his parents, and after I heard that rumour about the boys being left on the island I heard from the boy's mother that the boy -- this was a different occasion -- the boy had been at his aunt's for a holiday, and the mother had to go and bring him back after two days because he was homesick.

Yes? - At the time I was asked to go on the Committee I asked Mr. Hamilton about that incident, and he said the boy was homesick, but he said if boys are homesick they are not going to tell their parents, they are going to tell a different story. That tied in with what I had heard from the mother of the boy, and I thought it must have been just rumours.

Following the meeting with the Council did you take any active part as a Committee member in the physical running of the club? - No.

Did you do anything as secretary? - I did correspondence.

Was there much of that? - I would say there was quite a bit. There were letters. I was only involved at the one summer camp, and there were letters about that. There were letters I think about obtaining grants for equipment, but I really can't remember. It was just general correspondence.

We have had a lot of evidence about his writing to all and sundry on numerous occasions. Was that his practice in the time you were secretary? - No.

So the letters you are describing sounded as though they had some purpose? - Yes. They were to do with the running of the club.

They were not letters of complaint, for example, or letters of contention with other bodies and complaining about other people? - I don't quite follow you. You mean that the club was complaining?

Yes? - No, not that I recall.

After you were on the Committee did Mr. Hamilton continue to visit your home? - Yes.

Did you visit his home on any occasion? - Not socially. I don't think there were regular Committee meetings. I think there was one other Committee meeting in his house. We did not visit his house socially, no.

Did you meet his mother, at that time known as his sister? - Yes, at the first meeting to form the Committee.

Was she on the Committee? - No.

Did you meet his father, whom we now know is his grandfather? - No, I met who I thought was his sister, although it was his mother, and I met who I thought was his mother, who has turned out to be his grandmother.

But neither was on the Committee? - No.

How long did you remain secretary? - I can't remember whether it was 1984 or 1985, but it was in the autumn of that year. If it was 1984 it was from the autumn of 1984 to the spring of 1985; if it was 1985 it was the autumn of 1985 into the spring of 1987.

If I say to you the meeting with the Council was in the autumn of 1985.....? - Well, it was from the autumn of 1985 until the spring of 1987 I was on the Committee.

What led to you resigning from the Committee? - I changed my job. I had only been working a few hours a day, and when I changed my job I felt I did not have the time. It was not so much the quantity of the work, it was the inconvenience of it. Mr. Hamilton would just come up to the house just after tea time saying he wanted letters done, and he would wait and take them with him to post or to photocopy.

Did your husband remain on the Committee after you resigned? - Yes.

For/

For much longer? - I couldn't tell you. Less than a year, I think.

Throughout the period up until your resignation was your husband still going shooting with Hamilton from time to time? - They did not actually go shooting together on a regular basis. I think my husband maybe went with Mr. Hamilton twice, but not at the Dunblane Club. It was at a range that Mr. Hamilton used: I don't know if it was Dechmont.

Did Hamilton ever bring any weapons to your home? - Yes.

On more than one occasion? - I remember just one occasion.

What did he bring? - I don't know. I think it was two firearms, but I don't know what kind they were. I am not into firearms.

Do you remember if any of them was a rifle? - I think one was a black thing about that. I remember at the time thinking it was a terrible looking thing, a terrible looking piece of equipment.

You were indicating 18 inches to two feet? - Yes.

Did he say anything about that particular weapon? - No.

In your statement you have referred to him coming to the house and having a gun in a case and taking it out to show you and your husband? - Yes.

And saying it cost over £1,000, and he was told he was only getting £100 compensation back when it was handed in, because of Hungerford? - I do know he told us at the time of Hungerford that he had -- was it a Kalashnikov?

£1,000.

After you and your husband were off the Committee did Hamilton continue to visit you? - Yes.

Until when? - I think it must have been during 1989. I think it must have been before the summer of 1989.

What brought matters to an end? - I didn't realise this at the time; we only discovered this after this happened. We wondered why he had stopped coming, and my son-in-law told me one night when we were out and he was in the house Hamilton called, and my son-in-law told him not to come back, that he was making a nuisance of himself.

And he didn't? - He didn't re-appear after that.

Was he a nuisance about that time? - He was. When he started coming at first I didn't see him as much as my husband, because it was always on a Thursday night, and I was always out when he came. But he started coming two, three, sometimes four nights a week latterly.

Did he continue to use your name as a Committee member after you had resigned? - I didn't know if he did.

Did it come to your attention that he still had your name on a leaflet? - That was my husband's name. I found out at the time of this that he had both my husband and myself down as members of a previous club, which we had never anything to do with.

Now, prior to the formation of the Committee you have been telling us about he had his dispute with the Council over the letting of the premises at the High School, and in connection with that there was a petition presented to the Council to try to keep the lets going. Did you have any part to play in that petition? - I don't remember a petition.

We have had evidence in the Inquiry that you were actually round doors collecting signatures for/

for a petition? - That I was?

Yes. You went to George Robertson's door? - I don't remember that.

You stay quite near him? - Yes. I had been round with a petition round Dunblane to do with the rates, but I don't know when it was. That was the only time I remember going round. I also collect for Christian Aid in Dunblane. I don't remember going round with a petition.

When was the petition about rates? - I don't know.

Was the Council Labour or Tory? - I don't know.

I am just trying to work out whether you would go to George Robertson's door? - I had an area to do. George Robertson lives just up the hill from us. If there was someone collecting or going round that would include the area.

If he was within the area.....? - Yes. I went to people's doors with a petition about the rates, and they said they wouldn't sign it as they were employed by the Council. I was employed by the Council as well.

If you look at D50/H(v) -- have you got that? - Yes.

You will see that is a letter headed "Dunblane Rover Group"? - Yes.

And under that "J. Williams, representative of parents"? - Yes.

And you have told us there was a J. Williams at your meetings? - Yes.

His address is 3 Murdoch Terrace, Dunblane? - Yes.

This is dated 2nd November, 1983, addressed to the Director of Administration and Legal Services of the Council? - Yes.

It reads "We as parents of the boys attending/attending the Dunblane Rover Group wish to appeal against the decision taken by the Education Authorities (following a sub-committee recommendation), to terminate the lease of the Dunblane High School"? - Yes.

It talks about Mr. Hamilton, the group leader, and all the other voluntary helpers having given a great deal of their time and resources to ensure that members find a healthy outlet to their boundless energy by channelling it into a constructive form? - Yes.

And then if you go down to the bottom of that paragraph it says "We believe that Mr. Hamilton is the victim of malicious back-stabbing by a person or persons unknown possibly calculated to cause disharmony"; is that right? - Yes.

Then he says "We are all proud to have Mr. Thomas Hamilton in charge of our boys. He is a man gifted with excellent qualities of leadership, integrity and absolute devotion to his lads. Above all, he cares"? - Yes.

Then it has "Yours faithfully, the parents (as listed over)"? - Yes.

Then there is three pages of signatures? - Yes.

I can tell you there are 70 signatures there. Now, did you gather these signatures? - Not that I remember.

It is headed "Dunblane Rover Group"? - I had nothing to do with that.

These forms say "Management Committee, Dunblane Rover Group". Do you see that? - Yes. I was never on the Committee. I had nothing to do with the Dunblane Rover Group, although when this Inquiry was coming up I was shown a letter that had been sent to the Council where my husband's name and my own name were on as being members of the Committee, but I was not there. I was not involved with the Committee until 1985 when the Dunblane Boys' Club started up. That was when I became involved. I had nothing to do with the Rover Group, and I can't see my signature on this petition, so I would/would imagine if I had been round collecting signatures I would also have signed the petition.

Well, you were not the parent of a child who would be attending the group, so it may not have been appropriate for you to sign it, the way it is worded? - No.

I may have given you wrong information about the time of the formation of the Committee. Perhaps you can clarify this for me. If you go to D53 in that volume, I think you can see this is a letter of 24th February, 1984 to Mr. Buchanan, the Director of Administration and Legal Services, headed "Dunblane Boys' Club"? - Yes.

It says "We.....are pleased to supply the information that you request" in the first sentence? - Yes.

And the Management Committee is set out there, including your own name as secretary? - Yes.

And your husband is there, and some of the other names you have mentioned are there? - Yes.

If you go to the end of that letter you will see that you appear to have signed it? - Yes.

Do you remember signing it? - I don't really remember the letter, but I presume yes. No, I don't think so.

Is it your signature? - It looks like my signature, but I certainly did not type it.

Did you sign it? - Well, it looks like my signature.

I take it you would not sign a blank? - No.

If/

3.20 p.m.

If you go to the second page and in the middle you will see a heading "Difference between Dunblane Rover Group and Dunblane Boys' Club" and it says "1. The Committee is agreed to disband as Dunblane Rover Group; 2. The Committee is agreed to form as Dunblane Boys' Club; 3. The Committee is agreed to a new constitution as enclosed", all suggesting that this is a replacement of the Rovers Group, to give it a different identity. Were you not party to this letter? - I don't recollect it.

Can I ask you then to look at another item which I think may have been copied. It is a letter of the 31st of October 1983. It is also in.....? - Sorry, I was still looking at this other letter. Which one are you on?

Another one will be given to you and it is also in D21/J(i) and it has got a number 28. There is a whole series of these letters but one of them has the number 28. It will be put in front of you. Now, you will see that that is a letter of the 31st of October 1983 to Mr. Buchanan again and the heading is "Dunblane Rover Group -- let of Dunblane High School" and you have signed it? - I am just reading the letter.

Well, before you do that, can you tell me if that is your signature? - Well, it looks like my signature.

All right. Now, yes, please read the letter? - No, I didn't sign that. It looks like my signature but I didn't sign it because it says in it "Firstly, as an interested member of the Management Committee of the Dunblane Rover Group" and I wasn't a member of the Dunblane Rover Group. I wasn't associated with it at all.

It also says in the second paragraph "All activities are well supervised, as I myself have been present on various occasions at meetings and outings". Had you been present at any? - I was at one. I don't know if it was with the Dunblane Boys' Club or if it was when he was with the Rover Group but we were invited. I think it was maybe when he had the Rover Group. He asked us if we would like to go one Sunday on a swimming outing to/

to the Commonwealth pool but that was not in an official capacity. He was taking the boys and asked if we would like to go and take our two daughters. It wasn't official.

The letter in the second paragraph says "I have accompanied the boys from the group on outings to places of public interest when the behaviour of the boys has made me proud to be associated with the group. This, nowadays, cannot always be said of large groups of children out in public"? - Yes. Well, I was at the Commonwealth pool on one trip with the boys.

It then goes on to say "As a parent of two daughters, my children naturally are not members of the Dunblane Rovers but they have had the pleasure of being invited on several occasions to sail with Mr. Hamilton, my husband and myself"? - Well, that is true. We did go sailing with him.

"The care and safety shown to my family, especially the two children, in these instances, was of the very highest standard", is that right? - Well, yes, it says that.

The next section says "Secondly-I come into contact daily with many of the boys from the group in the course of my duties as School Helper at Dunblane Primary School, and I know how much they enjoy the groups activities"? - Yes, well, I have lost you now.

If you look at the word "Secondly"? - Yes.

And then the next bit says.....? - Well, I was a School Helper at Dunblane.

And did you come in daily contact with many of the boys from the club? - Well, I wouldn't have known the boys with the Rover Group because I wasn't associated with the Rover Group.

You might have known them if you had been to the Commonwealth pool with them? - On one occasion.

You would probably know the boys if you saw them at school and then at the pool. Would you not/not recognise them? - If you ask me now to name the boys who were in the Dunblane Group that I was associated with I could probably only name two at the moment.

Is it not possible even that you wrote this letter? - Not when it says "Firstly as an interested member of the Management Committee of the Dunblane Rover Group" because I was never involved with the Dunblane Rover Group.

Are the rest of the contents largely accurate? - Well, I wouldn't know about "all activities are well supervised" because I was never there. I was never even at a meeting of the Dunblane Boys' Club although I was the secretary. We went sailing twice with Mr. Hamilton.

If you go forward now please to D78/J(i) you see there this is an excerpt from a Minute of a meeting of the Further Education and General Purposes Sub-Committee of the Education Committee. Have you got it? - Yes.

Held on the 23rd of September 1985 and if you could go over two pages.....? - Excuse me, but was this the meeting held in the Council Chambers?

Well, this Minute relates to a meeting which you were not at but you were at the earlier meeting which is referred to there as a special sub-committee and if you go over two pages you will see the Minute of the sub-committee meeting which was actually held on the 4th of September? - 1985?

Yes? - Yes, that is when I became involved.

And you will see your name near the top of that page? - Yes.

As one of the people coming to the meeting? - Yes.

And the others there were Mr. Hamilton, Mrs. McFarlane, your husband, Mr. Williams and a solicitor. Do you remember that? - I don't remember the solicitor. Probably because I didn't know the man.

Well,/

Well, it is a woman? - Oh, sorry. I remember Mr. Hamilton, Mrs. McFarlane and it has got Mr. K. Anderson. It should be Mr. E. Anderson. Mr. Williams.

Were these people, apart from the solicitor, you do remember being at the meeting? - Yes.

Now, we know that there was correspondence about the possibility of such a meeting for quite a long time and we have seen a letter dated the 24th of February 1984, you saw it earlier, in which you are listed as a member of the Committee? - That was of the Rovers?

No, the new group? - Sorry.

If you go back to D53 in H(v). You have seen that already but just to remind yourself, this is a letter your signature appears on and that one is dated February 1984 so it is quite difficult I suppose to date exactly when you first got involved in this Committee? - I got involved in the Committee when he got to renew the let and the name was then the Dunblane Boys' Club.

But can we date it to the letter which is the same idea or the meeting with the Council which is a year and a half later? - Well, it was the meeting of the Council because we had a meeting at Mr. Hamilton's house to ask the people that were present if they would form a Committee and then I think it was that same week or maybe the week after that we had a meeting in the Council Chambers.

Well, if the date on the letter is accurate then the presence of your signature on it is a bit of a mystery? - Exactly. I mean, I don't really know it is my signature. It looks like it.

I suppose you might say Hamilton writes in a similar way to you on the face of the signatures. Does the signature look like yours at all? - Well, if you look at the signature on my cheque card, it is not my signature that is on that letter. If you want to look at that?

I think his lordship might want to look at it? - And compare it with the signature on that letter./

letter. It is not my signature I would say.

It might be as well if you look in that connection also at the other letter, the one which was in D21/J(i) which had the 28 at the top of it. The other place that we had your signature, apparent signature, the letter of the 31st of October? - Well, as I say, it looks like mine.

Does that look like your signature? - Similar but if you look at it with the cheque card, it is not.

Well, does it look different from the cheque card signature? - Yes.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. JONES: Can I try and be clear about the sequence of events. You knew Thomas Hamilton before the let of Dunblane High School was stopped by the Council? - Well, I wasn't aware of that being stopped. As I say, my husband was more involved on that side than I was up to 1985 because when he called, I'm sure it was a Thursday he normally called and I go out every Thursday night and have done for the last 30 years so I would only see him for a few minutes and when I came back I would say to my husband "Was Tommy up tonight?" and he would say yes and I would maybe say "What was he saying?". As I say, I didn't often see him at that time.

I just want to be clear about this. Were you or were you not aware that the Council had stopped Mr. Hamilton's let at Dunblane High School? - I wasn't aware of it.

Were you never aware of it? - No, I thought it was when he went.....I thought he had been asked to disband the Rovers Group because of the name and that when he went to re-name it the Dunblane Boys' Club, that is when the Council had problems with renewing the let.

And you look again please at D78/J(i). That is the Minutes of the meeting that you attended at the Regional Council in September of 1985. Do you have that document? - D78/J(i), yes.

And that is the Minute of the meeting? - Yes.

Now, /

Now, can you turn to the third page, at the top of which you will see X-219? - Yes.

And then you see the words "Confidential-Not for Publication". Do you see that? - Yes.

You are then recorded as being present. Do you see that? - At that meeting?

At that meeting. Is that right? - If that was the meeting.

Well, do you see your name? - Yes.

And your husband's name? His name is amongst those who were there? - Yes.

Just below the names do you see it says "During a wide-ranging discussion with the Representatives of the Club the following specific points were raised by the Sub-Committee:-" and then there are eight points? - Yes.

Now, do you remember while you were there being asked a number of questions? - No, I don't remember it.

But you accept that you were because that was the purpose of the meeting? - Probably, yes.

And do you see the third question was "During the period since the let for Dunblane Rover Group was terminated had the Committee made any attempt to find alternative accommodation in Stirling, Dunblane or any other area?". Do you see that? - Yes.

Now, if this Minute is accurate, you were at least aware in September of 1985 that the let for the Dunblane Rover Group had been terminated? - Well, I understood it to be that the Rover Group had been asked to disband because of the name.

Well, it says here that you were asked about something happening after the group was terminated. All I am asking you is if this Minute is correct then it must mean that you knew at least in September 1985 the let had been terminated? - I am not saying it wasn't. I am just saying I don't remember it. My recollection is that the Rover Group/

Group had been asked to disband because of the name.

Well, I think that is really what I am trying to get at. It may be your recollection now is not perfect. We are talking of events that happened between 11 and 15 years ago? - Well, I don't remember because I don't even remember the exact date. Until the gentleman there said it was 1985, I couldn't remember the date.

But you accept there is a difference between things not having happened and your not remembering whether they happened? - Well, yes. I suppose so.

Now, do you see that the first point that was put to the people who were there was this; looking back at this document, "Of the Committee membership detailed in the letter dated 24th February, 1984, from the Secretary of the club, only three were residents in Dunblane". Do you see you were asked that? - Well, as I say, I don't remember it. You know, when we had the meeting.....

If you just answer me. Do you see that is in the Minute? - Yes, I see that.

Now, we have heard that one of the papers that was available to the Council was the letter that you have been shown, the letter which bears your signature of the 24th of February 1984. Now, can you have in front of you again please D53 of H(v)? - Yes.

Can/

3.40 p.m.

Can you accept, although you may not remember it, this letter of the 24th February, 1984 was in front of the committee when you attended this meeting in September, 1985? - I cannot answer that, because as I say, I don't think that signature on that letter is mine.

Leaving aside your recollection, I am just asking you if you can accept the Minute is aware of a letter dated 24th February from the Secretary of the club? - Yes.

And the only Secretary of the club you have ever known about is you? - Yes.

Could you look at another document, which is in the other bundle in front of you, D.....? - If I can go back to that, Dunblane Boys' Club was not effective until after this meeting, or at the time of this meeting.

I think you have already seen that the letter of the 24th February, 1984 records the change of name from the Dunblane Rover Group to the Dunblane Boys' Club? - I thought it was at this meeting we were at at the Council Chambers.

If you look at page X-220, you see just below halfway down there is a paragraph which does not begin with a Roman numeral? - Yes.

It begins "In closing their remarks..."?
- Yes.

You see it says "In closing their remarks the representatives from the Dunblane Boys' Club referred to the change of name of the club from Dunblane Rover Group. The club representatives felt they would prefer to revert back to their original name and wondered if the Regional Council would find this acceptable". Do you see that? - Yes. Can I just read that?

Yes? - Well, this was the representatives of the Dunblane Rovers Group I presume saying they would prefer the name to be the -- the Dunblane Boys' Club rather -- saying they would prefer the name to revert to the Dunblane Rovers Group, but that didn't mean the representatives/representatives there were representatives of the Rover Group.

I am putting this to you because you said it was at this meeting in September, 1985 that the name was changed from the Rover Group to the Boys' Club? - No, I didn't say that. I said that my understanding was that when the Rover Group was disbanded it was because of the name, and that I became involved with the Committee of Dunblane Boys' Club, which was in 1985.

Now, you told us I think that the signature on the letter of 24th February, 1984 is not yours. Could you say which one this is? D53/H(v)? - Yes. If you look at my credit card it is not.....

I am not interested in your credit card. The question is whether you are saying the signature on the letter of 24th February, 1984 is not yours. Is that what you are saying? - Just let me read the letter. I am not really sure.

It may be yours? - What I cannot understand is why I would be typing that at the time when I was not the Secretary.

I am not asking you that. I am simply asking you about the signature, and I am asking you to say whether or not you think it is yours? - Well, I would say it looks like mine, but I am not sure.

Could you look at another document, D74/J(i)? -
Yes.

This is a letter which bears to come from your organisation, dated 21st August, 1985. Can you see that? - Yes.

And it is handwritten and appears to be signed by your signature, Katherine M. Anderson? - Yes.

Was this written by you? - Yes.

And that is the same style of signature we have seen both on the letter of 31st October, 1983 and the letter of 24th February, 1984? - Similar, yes.

Can/

Can I ask you to look at one further document? If we go to D49/H(v), this is a very faint photocopied letter. Do you see that? - Yes.

Can you turn from that, turn from the second page and go on to the third page which has "7b" at the top right-hand corner. Have you got that? - Yes.

This appears again to have your address in Dunblane in the top right-hand corner? - Yes.

And that appears to have your husband's signature on the bottom, Ewan Anderson? - Yes.

And that bears the date 6th November, 1983? - Yes.

Do you see the text "Dear Sir, As a fair-minded person I feel obliged to write to you to protest about and to condemn the Director of Education's handling of the Dunblane High School let to the Dunblane Rover Group.

"Firstly let me refute the allegations made about Mr. Hamilton's character and his parting company with the Scout Movement"? - Yes.

And then if I can take you on to the fourth paragraph "I had no personal connection with this group until recently, when due to an injury the sports coach could not attend the Thursday meeting. Mr. Hamilton asked for my assistance to run the five-a-side football. I thoroughly enjoyed the experience and was astounded at the manners and good behaviour of the boys"? - Yes.

Do you remember an occasion when your husband helped out with the five-a-side football? - He did with the Dunblane Boys' Club occasionally, but I could not differentiate.

He stated, "My wife, daughters and myself then assisted with an outing to the Commonwealth Pool in Edinburgh, and can honestly say that we were proud to be seen in their company"? - Yes.

And you remember a trip to the Commonwealth Pool? - Yes. As I say, we were not involved in the running of the club. Mr. Hamilton invited/invited us to go one Sunday.

And that was with the Rover Group? - Yes. Not as part of it. It was a social invitation.

It goes on "In fact we have been so impressed that my wife and I have volunteered our services as members of the Management Committee, now acting as Secretary and Treasurer respectively"? - Yes.

And that is what happened, isn't it? - Yes. Not with the Dunblane Rover Group; with the Dunblane Boys' Club.

Is it just that you do not have any recollection of the club being called the Rover Group at that time? - No. I was not involved with the Dunblane Rover Group; I was involved with the Dunblane Boys' Club.

How do you explain this letter? - I don't know. Mr. Hamilton had put down on a letter that we saw that the CID had produced, he had us put down as members of the Management Committee of the Rover Group, and that was not true. What I am saying is, is this letter true? Did my husband sign that? Because we were not members of the Management Committee of the Rover Group; we had nothing to do with the Rover Group. We were not involved with the Rover Group.

If that is right it must follow that the letter which appears to be signed by you on the 31st October, 1983 is just false?
- That is what I am saying.

And the letter which appears to be signed by your husband a week later is just false? - Yes.

And the letter dated 24th February, 1984 is just false?
- Well, I would say that because I was not involved in the Dunblane Rover Group.

And although there is reference in the letter dated 24th February, 1984 in the Minutes of the Committee meeting you attended it must be a reference to some other letter? - Maybe this is a letter that my husband didn't sign and that is a letter/letter that I didn't sign: but I know I was not involved with any club until the meeting at the Chambers, which appears to be in 1985.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. TAYLOR: You may be relieved to know that I do not propose to ask you any questions about letters or Minutes, but I would like to ask you some questions about meetings which you had with Mr. Hamilton: do you understand? - Yes.

You have told us that when he came to your house it was in the order of once a week at first, usually on a Thursday, when you were out; is that correct? - Yes, as far as I remember.

Can you say what year he started attending your house? - I don't remember, but my husband dated it to 1982, because he was unemployed at that time.

Your husband was unemployed? - Yes.

You have told us that the frequency of the visits increased from once a week to eventually three or four times a week, and finished when? - 1989.

At first you would not have had much contact with Mr. Hamilton if you were out on Thursdays when he called? - Yes.

But you would have been in the house on occasions when he started to visit more regularly? - Yes, I was in when he called.

And when you were in the house with him did you form an impression as to how he looked on you and your husband? Never mind how you might have looked on him, but what was your perception as to how he looked upon you? - We were friends.

What sort of topics would you discuss with him? - Just general topics of conversation. We talked about the clubs, we talked about general topics of conversation, about games, board games, etc.

Would there be any distinction as to what you would speak to Mr. Hamilton about and what you would/would speak to your neighbour about? - No.

At what stage did the visits increase from once per week to something more frequent than that? - I think it was the fact that one of the other members of the Committee whose two sons were in the boys' club moved away from Dunblane, and he had visited them, and when they moved away he started visiting us so often.

Can you say when that was? - No.

Who were these other people he visited? - The name of the family?

Yes? - The Williams.

Do you know how often he attended at their house? - No, but I know it was on a regular basis.

About once a week? - Probably.

Other than the Williams was there any other family who he visited, to your knowledge? - In Dunblane?

Anywhere? - He did speak about a friend he had -- his name escapes me at the moment: he was something to do with one of the gun clubs. I only knew his first name.

Was that a Mr. Woods? - Can you tell me the first name?

Clive Woods? - Yes.

Taking these two groups separately, how did you perceive Mr. Hamilton saw the Williams? - How did I perceive Hamilton's view of the Williams?

Yes? - Just as friends, the same as we were.

In relation to Mr. Woods, how did you perceive he thought of Mr. Woods? - He did not mention him so often. He knew we knew Jim Williams, but I had never met this Clive, so he didn't talk about him so much.

Did/

Did the name Williams come up reasonably frequently in your discussions with Mr. Hamilton? - Just as a topic of conversation.

Would you describe Mr. Hamilton as a loner? - I suppose so, yes.

In what respect? - Well, I suppose apart from the visits to us and his club meetings I don't think he had other social.....

Yourself, the Williams and Mr. Woods? - I don't know how often he visited Mr. Woods, but he visited us regularly and he visited the Williams regularly.

You told us about two instances where there were rumours that some boys were left on an island, and one rumour was that they were given only a tin of mince and another rumour was that they had only been given a tin of beans; is that right? - Yes.

Were you able to make enquiries as to whether that was true? - No.

Did you believe that rumour? - No.

But it was a rumour which you were able to check upon, if I have understood your evidence correctly? - No, I didn't check up on it. I had heard the rumours, and I knew one of the boys concerned, and a while after I had heard the rumour just in conversation the boy's mother in general conversation said to me that her son had been at his aunt's for a week's holiday, and she had to go and pick him up after two days, because he was homesick.

And it was rumoured he had been somewhere other than his aunt's? - No. He was homesick.

And he had been homesick at one of Mr. Hamilton's camps? - I heard the rumour, then I had a discussion with the mother.

What was the rumour? - There was a rumour that the boy had been left on the island with a tin of beans. I heard that conversation, and then in general conversation with the mother, nothing to do with the club, she said that her son had/had been away up at an aunt's for a week's holiday and she had to go and bring him back after two days, that he was homesick.

Was this the same week it had happened? - Yes, she had just gone and brought him back. But it was months after the rumour; it was quite a while after that. After that I said to Mr. Hamilton what was the story about this rumour, and this was when he said to me that the boys were homesick but they didn't want to go home and say to their parents they were homesick, so they made up stories.

Do you know why Mr. Hamilton brought round weapons to your house? - Because of the common interest with my husband. When they had gone shooting it was pistol shooting, which my husband doesn't do; he shoots .22 target. I think Mr. Hamilton took my husband to Dechmont on one occasion I can remember.

So he has taken guns round to your house on the way to the pistol shooting? - No, this was a different time. The times he went with my husband he called the house. I didn't see the firearms. They just went away. On a different occasion he brought the guns, yes.

This was because of their mutual interest in guns? - Yes. Not me, but my husband.

RE-EXAMINED BY MR. BONAMY: I got the impression initially you didn't know Mr. Williams. How well did you know him? - I didn't know him until I met him at the meeting in Mr. Hamilton's house.

That was the first time you met him?
- Yes.

How/

4.00 p.m.

How long after that was it he moved away? - I can't remember when he moved away. It was after I came off the Committee. He was still on the Committee when I, you know, resigned.

The letter which you were shown by Mr. Jones, which is signed by your husband, your husband has already told us he wrote or at least was responsible for. Did you and your husband get involved in the Committee at the same time? - We joined the Committee at the same time but I resigned before my husband.

So if your husband accepts his involvement in 1983 around the time the lets were lost, does that help you? - Well, my husband was involved, as I say, with Mr. Hamilton. I am not saying on Committees but he was involved, you know, more on that side of it than I was. I wasn't involved until the 1985 but I know my husband was involved before that because he was able to say to me that he had tried to get to the bottom of the rumours and nobody would do anything. You know, they would never name names. Because my husband told me he had gone to this one and that one and people just said that so and so told me that and my husband tried to get to the bottom of it and wasn't ever able to do so because nobody would come forward with any names. They would say "Oh, I don't know. I just heard it". So my husband was involved with Hamilton but I'm not saying on Committees but involved with talking about it with him before I was.

Well, you will see or you will remember that the letter which he signed said that he had no personal connection with the group until recently when due to an injury the sports coach could not attend the Thursday meeting and Hamilton asked for his assistance in running five-a-side football? - Yes, but that was on one occasion. If that letter was genuine.....

Well, he has told us it was? - I know, but did he read it?

Well, he took an oath like you did? - Yes, but did he read the letter? He may have looked/looked at the bottom and thought it was like his signature but, as I say, it says "In fact, we have been so impressed that my wife and I volunteer ourselves as members of the Management Committee now acting as Secretary and Treasurer" and that would appear that is to the Dunblane Rover Group, wouldn't it?

It could be? - Well, I mean, the letter was headed the Dunblane Rover Group and my husband and I were not involved on any Committee with the Dunblane Rover Group although I was shown a letter by the CID Detective who came to the house when I was interviewed and she showed me a letter that Mr. Hamilton had written to the Council and our names were on it and we were not members of the management group for the Rovers.

I follow all of that but take it from me that your husband did see the letter and did have the opportunity of reading it here and did confirm his agreement with its contents? - Yes, but I am saying did he read it or did he look at it?

Well, would you listen to what I am saying please. Take it from me that he did have the letter and he did have an opportunity of reading it here and certain parts of it were subsequently put to him with which he agreed? - Well, my husband.....

Just give me a moment to finish the question. In the light of that he confirmed that this letter was his. Now, if that is the case and he is referring there to the two of you becoming involved in the Management Committee and you agree you both got involved at the same time, does that help to confirm that you actually were involved in November of 1993? - No, because I know that I wasn't involved with the Committee until it was the Dunblane Boys' Club in 1985 and neither was my husband. We were not involved with the Rovers Group at all and I can swear that on oath, that I wasn't. I had nothing to do with the Dunblane Rovers Group. Nothing.

MR. BONOMOY: Now, sir, that completes the oral evidence I propose leading today. I anticipate certain further oral evidence, in particular the evidence of Dr. Baird, Consultant Psychiatrist./

Psychiatrist. He unfortunately will not be available to give evidence until a week on Monday which is the 8th July. That may not present any particular difficulty in view obviously of the need of parties to consider the volume of evidence that has been led over the last 23 days in preparing Submissions they propose to make to you.

I have some written evidence which ought to be lodged now I think in the form of Productions largely. Not entirely but largely in the form of Productions which should be given R numbers.

Before I do that, I tender a letter from Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary dated the 25th June 1996 to the Procurator-Fiscal confirming the status of the draft Thematic Inspection Report and in the last paragraph it says, "I understand that you already have a copy of the draft Thematic Report and I would confirm that the decision on whether or not it should eventually be published will be taken when Lord Cullen's deliberations have been completed" and that is signed by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector.

The other items which I suppose, sir, should be Productions are first of all a document headed "Lord Cullen's Inquiry-Firearms offences" giving certain statistical information about the commission of offences with firearms.

Secondly, a series of four documents which are covered by a summary or description of them. These are documents relating to the form of inquiry form used by Police Forces in England and Wales. They were handed to me by an interested observer at the Inquiry. They do seem to be of some value, sir, and I thought it might be of assistance for you to see forms that are used elsewhere.

The next set of documents.....

LORD CULLEN: Before you go any further, can we just check what numbers we are clocking up as we go along. The letter with the statistics would, I suppose, be 68, is that right?

MR. BONOMOY: No, I think 69. The GMC Guidelines are 68 and the BMA Guidance was 67. So the/

the statistics becomes 69. The four forms with the accompanying note becomes 70.

The next one, 71, is the Precognitions which the Procurator-Fiscal obtained in relation to the investigation of the 1991 camp. So these are the Precognitions the Procurator-Fiscal at Stirling had. The Inquiry has already seen the police statements and the information before the Inquiry would be incomplete, in my submission, without this additional material which was before the Procurator-Fiscal.

Then lastly, a document headed "Violence to staff in the Education Centre" produced by the Health & Safety Commission and referred to by Mr. Gibb in the examination of a witness earlier and one which you, sir, expressed some interest in and which ought to be before the Inquiry.

With that, I complete the presentation of evidence so far.

LORD/

LORD CULLEN: Thank you very much, Mr. Bonomy. There are a few matters I would like to deal with.

Since the last list of written submissions, further submissions have come in or at least have been recognised to be submissions to enter the evidence. There will be a list which will be issued later today. I understand that a number of written submissions are still, so to speak, on their way here. These include I think supplementary written submissions from the British Sports Council and a joint submission I think by the Callander and also Stirling Rifle and Pistol Clubs. That may be of interest to those who are here.

Now, can I check on one point. I'm not sure whether parties have any intention of lodging any written submissions in regard to possible recommendations between now and the resumption of proceedings. Can I ask parties in turn what their position is. Mr. Campbell, what about you?

MR. CAMPBELL: Sir, my intention, if it is acceptable to you and obviously if it is not then I will think again, is to present submissions orally when it is appropriate but they could then be put into written form if necessary thereafter.

LORD CULLEN: The only thing about that that slightly concerns me is whether there might be a problem if you were to take some line which is not indicated by any of the existing submissions. Maybe that doesn't arise.

MR. CAMPBELL: Well, sir, you have indicated that concern to me informally before and you did indicate that it might be helpful if I was to speak to another party and that has happened and I think I have given him an assurance which should be satisfactory but certainly if there is any written information of that nature being circulated to one party, I will make sure that it comes to you and others.

LORD CULLEN: That is helpful. Thank you. Mr. Gibb, what is your position?

MR. GIBB: My position is that I have really been hanging on Mr. Campbell's coat tails to some/

some extent over the last few days and I may end up duplicating a certain amount of his verbal submissions but if the general view is that verbal submissions are appropriate, clearly I can excise what I need to on the day but I would be happy to make written submissions if you wish.

LORD CULLEN: It is entirely a matter for you. I don't think I have any great need for that except if there is any risk of you raising a point nobody else had yet raised in writing, in which case it might be fair if some notice is given of that.

MR. GIBB: I am quite happy to go along with verbal submissions.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you. Mr. Jones?

MR. JONES: Sir, I would not be making any recommendations and therefore I am not covered by the enquiry your lordship is making.

LORD CULLEN: Mr. Taylor?

MR. TAYLOR: There is still an outstanding document I promised to your lordship some time ago and that is in a fairly advanced stage of preparation and should be available some time towards the end of next week. It is a different form of submission, however, from what has been discussed up until now because it is a document from the Chief Constable. Insofar as there is a submission on the evidence then if the view is that the submission should be delivered orally then I will go along with that.

In my submission, it is on occasion of considerable advantage for the written submissions to be prepared and exchanged at a point of time in advance of the oral submissions because that affords an opportunity to make some preparation in response to any criticisms which might be made.

LORD CULLEN: I think at the moment all I am talking about is written submissions in regard to possible recommendations because the invitation that was made to the world at large was also extended to the parties and I simply want to know whether the parties are going to take up that invitation by giving me written submissions as distinct from making/making oral submissions when we resume. You have something in preparation?

MR. TAYLOR: Something in preparation coming not from my pen but from the pen of the Chief Constable.

LORD CULLEN: Well, that is very helpful. Thank you very much.

Now, as far as oral submissions are concerned, obviously parties will wish to devote some attention insofar as interests extend to (a) the circumstances that we have had explored over the last so many days, as distinct from secondly the possible area for recommendations. So far as the circumstances are concerned, I don't think I would want parties to feel that they have to prepare elaborate statements of fact as to what should be found established. I think that would be far too large an imposition. I am much more concerned with matters of fact to which observations or comments may be directed. I am not wishing to prevent anyone from presenting any presentation on the facts they want to but I am most particularly concerned with matters of observations or comments on the evidence that we have heard. There are a few instances in which evidence has been conflicting or uncertain and I think there are one or two instances where questions of credibility arise and I won't say what that is but I would like to hear what parties have got to say about that.

As regards possible recommendations, I don't think I need to add to what I have said earlier.

I don't at the moment, Mr. Taylor, feel any need to require any advance notice to be given. Are there any particular matters which are concerning you as to the future?

MR. TAYLOR: If I knew of the matter I would not be asking for the submissions in writing, sir.

LORD CULLEN: I think we should take things as they come. I think that somebody in your position will have a fair idea of what some other party might want to say in due course.

MR. TAYLOR: Yes.

LORD CULLEN: So far as the order of submissions is concerned, it might help if I said a bit about that now. I would intend to call on Mr. Bonomy to speak first insofar as he feels it necessary to address me on matters. Then I will call on the parties in the order in which they have been questioning and when that is done it may well be that Mr. Bonomy will wish to give me some further assistance in the light of what parties have said.

There is one other matter which has given me some concern. I have a strong impression that at least one of the parties here will wish to make certain submissions as to recommendations in regard to restriction of availability of firearms and ammunition or the like. I am quite anxious to make sure that I have a proper debate in which there is a proper contradicter so I have decided, and I have been thinking about this for some time, on my own initiative to invite representatives of what I might call the umbrella bodies to be present so that if they wish they can have their interests responded to in whatever submission may be made in that direction. I have therefore invited, and this invitation has been accepted, any legal representative of the British Shooting Sports Council and the Scottish Target Shooting Federation to be present whilst the submissions are taking place. This is an invitation which, as I say, I have made entirely on my own initiative. They don't come as parties to the Inquiry. They come here to assist me in trying to make sure that any submissions that are made are fully scrutinised and it is of course a response rather than to advance the case which they have already set down in their written submissions.

One other thing. Mrs. McKeand has reminded me to tell you that the Inquiry office will remain open here next week in the usual way so that if any party requires to be in contact with her, that can be done as usual.

Very well, we will now adjourn until Monday the 8th of July at 10 a.m.

Adjourned until Monday, 8th July at
10 a.m.

TWENTY-THIRD DAY.

LORD CULLEN: Well, let's resume. Now, Mr. Campbell?

MR. CAMPBELL: Thank you, sir. Good morning, Mr. Cooke.

MR. COOKE: Good morning.

DAVID JOHN COOKE,

CROSS-EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. CAMPBELL:
Professor, I want to move away for a moment at least from Hamilton as a specific case? - Indeed.

To discuss matters in a more general nature with you. Your first report deals in general with the question of the extent to which qualified people such as yourself can predict violent acts by people? - Yes.

Am I correct in understanding that there is considerable literature which indicates that mental health professionals are unlikely to be able to predict dangerousness in every case? - That is correct, yes.

Although, is it also fair to say that some of those interested in this field are more pessimistic than others who perhaps take a slightly more optimistic view to the possibilities? - I think that is true, but I think the research is suggesting with the correct techniques we can always improve, but there is always a barrier beyond which you cannot go.

Would it be accurate to say that when professional people such as yourself are dealing with a specific individual, the emphasis is upon management rather than prediction? - Yes, there are/

are two elements; risk assessment entails prediction, but if you are, say, suggesting release of a prisoner on parole and you think there is a potential for danger, you build in treatment and management in the Community.

And that would involve for example, if we discuss someone who is or has been in a psychiatric clinic, then their illness and their history will be well known? - That is correct, yes.

And it will be managed by a multi-disciplinary team?
- In the ideal world they will have, yes.

And tell me if it is just the ideal world, but usually at least, would there be features such as monitoring of the individual?
- Yes.

Discussion with him and between the team managing his.....? - Yes, there would be regular contact with the patient and monitoring of the individual and his symptoms.

And from time to time, positive intervention by perhaps hospitalisation, medication, discussion with relatives and so on? - Indeed.

The purpose of it being hopefully to head off or prevent crises and problems? - That is correct, yes.

So in so far as there may be a predictive element to the management of the patient, no doubt amongst other things that would be based upon the in-gathering of a large amount of information about that person? - You require information, a large amount, yes.

And hopefully a good working relationship between the doctor and his patient? - That is correct.

And again, preferably, would I be right, short time spells between one appointment and the next? - Indeed.

I think you touched upon in your report the question of the extent to which predictive assessment/assessment can be carried out by self-assessment by the individual himself? - Yes.

Would I be correct in understanding that there are very serious limitations about the use of questionnaires and the like? - Definitely; certainly that is my opinion. Many of the characteristics we are interested in cannot be measured reliably using self-report measures.

Not only do they rely upon the accuracy of the responses? - Yes.

Necessarily they involve a pre-determined set of questions rather than perhaps one which would arise if one was speaking to the person? - That is correct, yes.

Also, they omit observer judgment? - Yes, which is critical.

And again, by their very nature, do not permit the therapeutic or management intervention, or may not do so? - May not do so, but often these are used as part of a screen before you engage in more detailed interview of the individuals, but one has to make judgments about the reliability in each individual case.

So in the context of firearms licensing, you perhaps would not be an advocate of psychometric self-assessment? - Certainly not.

Am I correct in understanding from your evidence and from what we have heard from others, that so far as mental illness or a change from a peaceful to a violent person is concerned, this can happen in unforeseen and unexpected ways, sometimes over a relatively short period of time? - That is possible, even whether there is mental illness involved or not, I think.

And of course, peoples own domestic situation may change quite dramatically over short periods of time? - Yes, and that can cause an increased risk of future violence.

rapidly, yes.

So a firearm in one individual's hands today may be satisfactory, but next year the position may be very different? - That is correct, yes,

Which in itself may give rise to concerns if firearms licence holders are reviewed only every five years? - That is correct.

But it follows from what you have been saying, even a reversion back to the old system of three years, or perhaps even yearly reviews, nonetheless would not necessarily identify the problems we have just been discussing? - I would agree with that, yes.

Stop me if this is outwith your area, but in general terms, would I be correct in understanding that many deaths from firearms include suicides? - I wouldn't claim to be an expert on that.

But it is presumably common knowledge that a proportion of suicides have been committed by firearms? - Yes, indeed.

So any improvement of controls on firearms, in addition to perhaps having an effect on gun homicide, may also have some knock-on effect on suicide rates? - Potentially there is some evidence in the studies I quoted which suggested that may be the case.

Am I correct in understanding that fortunately very few suicides are also what is known as an extended suicide or someone who takes other individuals lives along with his own? - Yes, that does occur, but again I am not an expert in that particular field.

So as to whether Hamilton fell into that category, that is not a matter for you? - No, but I should say that suicide following murder is not an unknown phenomenon. There is literature on that.

afterwards? - Yes.

As to which category Hamilton fell, that is not something that you have applied your mind to? - I would speculate that he formed the intention before he killed the other people, and that is purely speculation.

Based upon what? - Primarily the fact that he changed weapons before killing himself, which seems ritualistic in some way, but it is speculation.

I won't press you on that because I think another professional may touch upon that, but thank you for your comments; so one conclusion we may draw, that might be drawn from your evidence is that psychological assessment is not a complete answer to any public concern following upon Dunblane? - Yes, I would agree with that.

Therefore, if that public concern is to be addressed, one needs to consider other methods of control? - Indeed.

With regard to your first report, in that context one alternative method of control which you point to is situational control? - That is correct.

The most obvious of which, if I have followed you correctly, is the restriction of the availability of lethal weapons? - Yes, indeed.

Can I ask you to turn to Page 22 of the first report please? Is that a passage in your report headed "Not all errors are equal"? - Yes.

You tell us that "The available evidence suggests that mental health professionals are conservative and tend to recommend the detention of patients who in actuality have a low likelihood of violent recidivisms"? - That is correct.

"That is, mental health professionals tend to make 'false positive' errors rather than 'false negative' errors"? - Indeed.

Could that be described as, for obvious reasons, a safety first philosophy? - That is correct, / correct, yes.

You go on "In the context of a secure psychiatric facility a high 'false positive' rate has to be carefully monitored as significant issues are at stake; the decision must balance the liberty of the patient with the protection of the public"? - Yes.

You go on "In the current context, where decisions may have to be taken regarding access to handguns or access to children's activities, judgments about acceptable errors may be easier to make. In this case public safety is not being balanced by the unreasonable detention of an individual in a secure facility, but merely by the removal of the opportunity to engage in interests, namely shooting or running children's organisations. If screening is introduced it should be designed to have a low 'false negative' error rate even, as is inevitable, this is at the cost of a high 'false positive' rate"? - Indeed.

Do I correctly understand that as a recommendation that in this particular context, the philosophy should be safety first? - Absolutely.

So that is both in the context of running children's organisations and firearms licensing? - Indeed.

And would I be correct in assuming that safety first philosophy should apply to the general regime of firearms licensing and also to dealing with a specific individual? - Could you clarify the question for me? I am not absolutely sure what you are asking?

I will take it out and start again -- a safety first philosophy may have effect in considering what the overall regime of firearms licensing ought to be? - Yes.

Would that be an appropriate approach? - In my opinion it would be, yes.

Similarly, once a firearms licensing regime is in place, it requires to be implemented or enforced in a particular individual's case. Would the same safety first philosophy apply? - Very much/much so, yes.

So would that suggest that in the context of a specific case -- I am not meaning to talk about Hamilton particularly -- but just generally, there may be considerable benefit if those involved are alert to any personality trait or characteristic that might be a cause for concern? - Yes indeed, it would be helpful.

And putting the matter at the very minimum perhaps, it may at least suggest the need for further careful consideration and investigational examination? - Yes, other examinations.

Your report dealing with Hamilton himself, while subject to the various caviats which you have made very clear, you appear to have reasonable confidence that he did demonstrate paedophile tendencies? - Yes indeed.

Bearing/

10.20 a.m.

Bearing that in mind, could we look at page 16 of your report, the more general report? - Yes.

In the middle of that page you have a little diagram overlapping some ellipses; psychological factors in one ellipse, situational factors in the other, then an overlap headed "Violence"? - Yes.

One situational factor I take it we will have in mind in the generality is whether or not the individual has ready access to weapons? - That is correct.

Let us assume for the moment that so far as psychological factors are concerned that individual is a paedophile or has paedophilic tendencies? - Yes.

Let us also assume that he runs boys' clubs and let us assume those boys' clubs have given rise to numerous complaints by parents and others in society? - Yes.

Might that give rise to other relevant situational factors in relation to paedophilia or in relation to violence?

I am thinking primarily in terms of risk of violence. Is it possible for example that a parent outraged by what has happened confronts Hamilton? - Yes, and that might escalate into violence.

If the paedophile is confronted by an outraged parent and the paedophile has ready access to firearms, that is a situational factor which one requires to bear in mind? - Yes.

So it is perhaps not possible to put paedophilia into a separate category from any concern over violence where there is ready access to weapons? - Yes. As with all human beings, we have to consider a whole range of factors when making a judgement.

We have heard some evidence -- I am not sure/sure if it has been communicated to you -- to the effect that at his clubs and summer camps Hamilton appeared to display no -- and I stress "normal" in this context -- no normal kindness or affection towards the boys, even if they were homesick or upset, whereas you or I might comfort a child in a perfectly normal way. There did not appear to be any characteristic of this nature in Hamilton's make-up? - I was not aware of that.

If that is the position does that add anything to your knowledge of him? - It adds weight to the view that he lacked empathy, which I have stated in my second report.

Turning to page 10 of the second report, you are dealing here with sexual sadism? - Yes.

In the middle of the paragraph you make reference to a work by Brittain in 1970? - The first report?

The one on Hamilton specifically which I have been calling the second report, because it is the second one you mentioned? - Yes. On page nine?

Page 10? - Yes.

Just to avoid any confusion, this is the report dealing specifically with Thomas Watt Hamilton, page 10? - Yes.

In the context of sexual sadism you make reference to some work by a gentleman or lady called Brittain in 1970? - A gentleman; yes.

This suggested that sexual sadists' interests in weapons is unusual? - Yes.

It says ".....they" -- that is the weapons -- "have an attraction for him far beyond what they have for an ordinary collector, and he may 'love' them, handling, and in the case of firearms, dismantling them and cleaning them for long periods of time. He has strong feelings about them, they have special favourites, and he can even have 'pet' names for these".

Campbell.

MR. CAMPBELL: Am I? Oh, dear. The confusion is entirely mine. I do apologise.

Page 10? - Yes.

The question I want to ask you is this. In the case of a person such as this is such a person more attracted to guns in the first place or does his attraction come after the guns have been made available to him? - It is difficult to know. As I tried to indicate yesterday, these conditions are relatively rare, and I think it is most likely that the interest in weapons is there first, and people seek access to them.

If I revert again for a moment to Hamilton as an individual, you told us he had paedophile tendencies? - Yes.

And you told us a considerable amount of other things about him? - Yes.

Is it a pure coincidence that he was also interested in guns? - Because he was interested in paedophilia?

Yes? - I think the majority of paedophiles would not necessarily be interested in weapons.

So there is some other trait or aspect to his character which explains his interest in guns? - Yes.

We have heard some evidence that he occasionally called his guns his friends or his babies? - Yes.

Does that seem to bear some relationship to what Brittain was talking about? - Yes, it seems to fit with what Brittain is describing.

We also have heard evidence that Hamilton would occasionally talk about his guns or his clubs and/

and rifle clubs, ammunition and the like, to the children in his care. We know of at least some instances where he has gone out of his way to show his guns to children in their homes? - Yes.

From the child's perspective, would that have any influence upon how they regarded Hamilton and his behaviour towards them? Not only did he run these clubs and camps in the way in which we know you have told us about, but these children knew he was a man who had guns. Would that have any bearing upon how a child viewed him? - It is difficult to know, to speculate on that. Many young boys are interested in weapons and guns, and they may have been fascinated by what he was showing them.

If we have agreed this is -- and there is just some evidence of this; I appreciate not a lot -- somebody who has exhibited paedophile tendencies towards young children, might the fact they know he also has a gun have some influence on the way they respond and react, or is this just too speculative? - I think it is just too speculative.

Still on the same report we were looking at a moment ago, and still on the context of sexual sadism, over the page at page 11 we read this: Brittain again in 1970 indicated that murders carried out by sexual sadists are generally planned days or even weeks ahead. "They frequently have low self-esteem, and Brittain contended that their acts of violence frequently occur when their self-esteem is challenged"; is that correct? - Yes.

According to Brittain they "May be vain and egocentric: 'He would rather be notorious than ignored'. His acquaintances may consider him to be 'strange', 'off-beat', 'twisted', 'a loner', 'kinky' or 'a weirdo'"? - Yes.

Here again do we have echoes of some of the material known about Hamilton? - Yes, I think that is the case. The evidence suggests that there were witnesses who felt he was strange. I can't remember the phrase that they used. Secondly, there seems to be good evidence that he was planning or he may have been planning this several months beforehand.

I think there is also, would you agree, some/

some evidence that his self-esteem may have been challenged by the rumours and gossip and police investigation into his conduct? - Yes. The fact that fewer boys were going to his clubs, he had been refused access to places to run his clubs, all these things would have an impact on his self-esteem.

It does appear he took considerable offence at, for example, the police investigation into his conduct; is that correct? - As far as I understand, yes.

Likewise, there would appear to be a degree of social ostracism in his immediate community? - Yes.

At the foot of page 11 in the text of "Poor Anger Control" you tell us that certain individuals may be provoked by for example frustration, perceived injustice or by the perception that they have been treated without due respect? - Yes.

You say "Their responses may be in the form of angry thoughts, physiological arousal or angry and violent behaviour, or indeed combinations of these three classes of response"? - Yes, indeed.

Again does the evidence concerning Hamilton indicate somebody who was constantly conversing in a somewhat unreasonable and aggressive fashion? - Yes. I suppose in terms of the number of letters of complaint he wrote it suggests he was somebody who complained a lot when he was angry.

So when it comes to not only assessing the personality of an individual but more generally in the context of assessing for example his fitness to be entrusted with firearms, would it be important to have regard to the cumulative picture built up over the years about that individual, rather than concentrate on individual episodes? - Yes, it is important to have the history.

And that would be of importance when assessing for example risk factors arising from his possession of weapons? - Yes.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. GIBB: Just one point/

point that has not been covered. GPs are at the moment sometimes asked to be counter-signatories? - Yes.

And one recommendation from the Chief Police Officer is that a medical report should be provided with any application? - Yes, a medical report.

Over and above the question of counter-signatory, that medical report would require some sort of professional capability on the part of a GP to assess personality and psychology. To what extent do you think GPs have that training and ability? - It is not only personality and psychological characteristics that need to be assessed; you would need to have knowledge of all risk factors of violence of paedophilia, which is not part of the training of GPs, and I doubt whether they would have the expertise to carry out the task.

So you think the position of a medical report from a GP in itself would be relatively worthless, because they would not have the training to assess particular characteristics? - I don't think they have the training to assess the risk of violence.

I suppose it would be very difficult in terms of the psychology for a report to be prepared by a specialist such as yourself? - Yes. I tried to make clear in my report that we probably do not have enough trained people to carry out risk assessments in relation to people being released from special hospitals or even from prison, so I don't think there are available experts to do this at the moment.

How many meetings would you need with an applicant to carry out a risk assessment? - In what context?

For the purposes of a firearm certificate, if an applicant was required to produce a medical report, and that included a risk assessment? - I think I have tried to indicate this. It seemed very difficult to predict within the community, where the rate of violence is very low. If one was to interview someone you would need several sessions and access to lots of collateral information/information before I could make a realistic estimate: but then there is always errors.

So would you think the practicalities of producing a medical report with every application or renewal of a firearm certificate -- do you think it would not be practicable? - That is correct.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. TAYLOR: If you would have the report which you prepared in relation to Mr. Hamilton with you, I am interested in what you say at the top of page three in the first paragraph on that page. You say that there is a natural human tendency to explain events, and you refer to "effort after meaning", which you say may result in significant distortion in the recall of events? - Yes.

In what way is the recall of events likely to be distorted? - Memory processes are active processes. It is not like putting information into a computer, which should come out the same way as it goes in. Things which happen subsequent to memories can change the memories, and they can come out in a different form. Can I give you an example of one of them?

Please do? - One study was looking at the cases of Downs Syndrome. This was in the days before people knew it was a chromosomal abnormality. They asked mothers of Downs Syndrome children to count how many frightening experiences they had had, and shocks, during their pregnancy, and they found these mothers had three times as many shocks as people who had no Downs Syndrome children. Now, these mothers were trying to explain what had happened by reorganising their memories. This is a well-established phenomenon, which has been recognised for 60 years.

Applying that to the particular events that we have been looking at at this Inquiry, how do you consider if at all the witnesses' recollections will have been affected by the events of the 13th March? - It may be they can selectively recall parts of Hamilton's behaviour. One witness I think described him as cold, unemotional, like a robot. Now, if you have heard what he has done you may re-interpret what his behaviour was like. Of course, psychologists are not immune from it either, or anyone/anyone else for that matter.

In a sense, what you have been asked to do in the course of this exercise is different from that which you would normally do? - Yes, indeed.

We have been dealing with an event, and we have asked you with hindsight to go back through the personality of an individual and make some sense of it? - Yes.

Whereas normally you would have the personality and try to predict what the future would be? - Yes.

Just how difficult does that make your task in doing what you were asked to do in the second of your two reports? - It makes it quite difficult. You have to balance the evidence as it is presented as I say in my caveats to begin with. It is a difficult task, and one cannot be expected to explain the whole lot.

Yes? - It may have been different if during the risk assessment Hamilton had shown some evidence of threat control mechanism or clear psychopathic traits, but there doesn't appear to have been that in the evidence.

I was interested in some of the descriptions or the labels which you attached to Hamilton? - Yes.

And one of these labels which appears from time to time in your report is that of him being a loner? - Yes.

What do you mean by the use of the label "a loner"?
- He seemed to have very few relationships outside his family. His adult relationships seemed very tentative relationships, and they were not close relationships. From the evidence it seems he did not necessarily disclose things to other people, he did not seem to share his thoughts of violence with other people.

people?

In fairness, I will refer you to the transcript. If you could have the transcript from Day 5 available, and look at page 593? - Yes, I have it.

Right down at the very bottom of the page, the witness, who was a Mr. Anderson, is asked "How often did he call at the house?", and the answer is "To the extent where he began to become a bit of a nuisance, like three to four nights a week"? - Yes.

If you could put that to the side and look at the transcript for Day 3, and in particular page 287, this is the evidence of a Mr. David MacDonald, and in the middle of the page just before the letter C he is asked "Did he phone quite a lot?", and the answer is "He" -- that is Hamilton "did phone me quite frequently, yes, and eventually it got a bit wearing having so many phone calls"? - Yes.

Then if you jump to the bottom, just after the letter E, "So from 1990 right up to 1996 did he continue to keep in touch with you?", and the answer is "Yes". Then he is asked "And how frequently during that period did he speak to you on the phone?", and the answer was "It was maybe a couple of times a week, something like that"? - Yes.

And/

10.40 a.m.

And if we could then look at one more transcript in this connection and that is Day 16 and page 1985. I think this will be a transcript which you will not have had sight of? - No.

You have had sight of the transcripts of Days 1 to 5? - That is correct, yes.

This is Mr. MacFarlane giving evidence and just above letter B he is asked "Q.- Through the 1980's did Hamilton continue to call on you from time to time? A.- Yes, he did.", and then at letter C, "Q.- What about the length of time? A.- Well, they would sometimes go on for about three or four hours in which time he consumed about half a dozen cups of tea and I think every chocolate biscuit you had in the house."? - Yes.

Now, if one takes those passages of evidence and looked at them, does one still become entitled to consider Mr. Hamilton as being a loner? - I think so, because I think we are looking at the quality of the relationship as much as the contact. I mean, there doesn't seem to be any evidence of a close, confiding relationship. At page 1985-B he says "You couldn't carry on a conversation with him". I think Mr. MacDonald referred..... if I have got the correct witness but I may not, I think he referred to it as a telephone relationship at one point.

Yes, that is correct? - So he appears to talk at some people but he doesn't seem to have a close, confiding relationship where he discloses things. In a sense that is what I conceive as an important element of a relationship with other people in regard to forming a relationship of a meaningful type.

Now, in your report you indicated that you considered that there were some traits of him having a sadistic personality disorder? - Yes, indeed.

And I think we will find these traits set out at page 8, is that correct? - Of the report on Hamilton?

Yes, the Hamilton report? - Yes, indeed.

And/

And am I right in thinking that these are the traits which are set out in the first complete paragraph of page 8, the paragraph starting "There is evidence that....."? - Yes.

And where does the evidence conclude in relation to ascertaining whether or not he had this disorder? - Page 9. The second paragraph.

I wonder if we could just look at some of that evidence. You indicate that as part of the examination one has to draw that Hamilton has become amused or gained pleasure from the suffering? - Yes, that is one of the characteristics one might look for.

And is that the characteristic which you were looking at in respect of the analysis of his behaviour? - Yes, that is one of the characteristics.

What were the other characteristics? - Well, for example, restricting the autonomy of other people. The interest in guns and so forth.

I wonder if you could look at the transcript for Day 3, Volume 3 at page 276. This is the evidence of Mrs. Ogilvie who was one of Mr. Hamilton's neighbours. Just below letter C she is asked first of all "Q.- So that on the occasions when there was some conversation between you, who was it that started the conversation off? A.- It was him and I nearly jumped out of my skin. Q.- Can you remember the first time that happened? A.- Well, if I was maybe out the back hanging out my washing, he was there. I never heard him coming but he was there and he would speak and I just got a fright and I would talk but then I just left him."? - Yes.

What in that passage which we have just looked at gives rise to the view that Hamilton derived amusement or pleasure from any conversation or interaction which he had with Mrs. Ogilvie? - It is ambiguous but I thought there was perhaps a possibility he was doing this deliberately but I admit it is ambiguous.

Well, where in that can one define that Mr. Hamilton might have been doing it deliberately? - Well, when she said "he was just there", it sounds/sounds as if he had come up behind her and surprised her.

The other aspect which you talked of a few moments ago was the way in which he restricted his grandfather's or adoptive father's movements in the house? - Yes.

Did you read the statement from the grandfather, the adoptive father, Mr. Hamilton? - Yes, I did.

I wonder if we could look at that. It should be in one of the volumes which you have before you. It is in the second day. We have already referred you to Day 2. I think it is set out on page 210? - I have it, yes.

Page 210 just at letter E I think the passage which you might have had in mind can be found. Mr. Hamilton says "On 24th August, 1992 I moved out of Kent Road and into sheltered housing accommodation. The reason I moved out was that Thomas began to take over the whole house, he moved all my personal possessions and items of furniture into my bedroom, some pictures I had on the wall and my telephone and other personal items. I just could not be bothered with it all and went to Stirling District Council and they arranged for me to move". Is that the passage you had in mind? - That and also I think there was a witness who suggested that Mr. Hamilton's adoptive father was restricted in terms of his access to the house. He would come home at night and would be kept outside for 20 minutes and so forth. So that together.

Yes, that was Mr. Dewar? - Yes.

Considering these passages did you also have regard to the evidence given by Mrs. Watt and Mrs. Watt's friend, Mrs. Sutherland? - Yes, I'm aware of that.

You see, on page 204, and I don't think it is necessary for you to have this passage before you, Mrs. Watt indicated that.....she is asked "Q.- In general terms what was the cause of the disagreement? A.- I can't tell you, I don't know, they just kept arguing; you see, my Daddy drinks and he used to come in and Tommy would be in his bed and/

and he used to wake him up and start arguing with him"? - Yes.

And Mrs. Sutherland was asked a similar question at page 207 on Day 2. "Q.- Did you ever see him in recent years in the company with Thomas Hamilton?", he being the adoptive father? - Yes.

And the answer was "No, never". "Q.- What sort of relationship did you understand they enjoyed? A.- Very bad. Q.- What was the cause of the problems? A.- The father's drinking."? - Yes.

Couldn't we find another explanation, perhaps a perfectly innocent explanation, for Hamilton's conduct towards the adoptive father? - That is one possible explanation, yes.

And is it just as likely an explanation as the explanation which you advanced, being a function of his personality trait? - No, I think the evidence of the personality trait is based on more than just, you know, the relationship with the father. I mean, it is the interest in guns and I think the lack of empathy which we have heard evidence of and so forth. So, I mean, in all human situations there are complex factors involved. Drinking might have been a factor and personality might have been a factor but again we can't necessarily add weight to which one is the most important but probably a combination of things.

In attaining the Degrees and qualifications which you have told us about yesterday, you would have spent a considerable amount of time in study and learning presumably? - Yes.

Can you say for how long you studied? - Six years full-time and five years part-time doing a Ph.D.

Would much of that training have been directed towards analysing the behavioural patterns of individuals and drawing conclusions therefrom? - Much of it would be, yes, and in the treatment and management.

And thereafter the treatment and management, /

management, I appreciate that? - Yes.

So you would be looking at events and drawing conclusions from them, which perhaps I might not be able to do, as a consequence of the training which you have had? - Perhaps, yes.

You have been asked to paint a picture of Hamilton and you very fairly told us of the difficulties in so doing, given the manner in which one must now do it. Can you tell me what base information you had about him? What material did you have before you when you were trying to paint a picture? - Essentially I had the transcripts from the first five days of the Inquiry, I had access to the video tapes, extracts of video tapes of Hamilton and I had access to some of the summaries produced by the police during their investigations and I think I note this in the introduction to the second report.

I beg your pardon, if you have done that I apologise if I have overlooked it. Yes, I do beg your pardon. I see that there? - I also discussed the case with Detective Chief Superintendent John Ogg to get an over-view of the evidence.

BY LORD CULLEN: Just one matter perhaps I can ask you about before you are re-examined. You were asked some questions by Mr. Campbell dealing with the matter generally about situations where violence might erupt and one situation would be in the process of confrontation? - Yes.

I can see how a person might react in some situations where he was faced with somebody else who was, let's say, belligerent or complaining? - Yes, indeed.

Now, in the case of Hamilton we seem to have a number of insights suggesting that in confrontation he was extremely cool, if not cold and highly controlled. I hope I am correctly representing the evidence. For example, I don't know if you have read about this but we heard of evidence where two women deposited rubbish, noxious substances, on him? - Yes.

And his response was extremely restrained. No/

No complaint, no kind of reaction at all? - Yes.

Do you know the incident I am talking about? - No, I am not aware of it. Oh, yes, I am. I beg your pardon. Yes, I know the incident.

The two ladies, Mrs. Haggard and somebody else? - Yes.

Now, does that tell you anything about his characteristics in that situation for a start? - It is quite interesting to Megargee, who I refer to in my report, who has classified different types of violent offender and describes people who are what he calls over-controlled personalities. These people are often timid, unassertive, individuals who don't appear to react in the way that Hamilton didn't appear to react. They can tolerate or they appear to tolerate a lot of provocation without reacting but when they do react they react in a very dramatic way. Megargee describes this and the evidence for it in the literature is not very convincing and certainly clinically I think I have only seen one case in my career.

Is he one of the authors in your report? - Yes, Megargee. He describes an over-controlled personality. There is not full agreement that this exists in the psychological community but he insists that it does.

We have also had him described as being somebody who planned things very carefully? - Yes.

Perhaps I should not extrapolate this too far but would that tend to suggest that in his case if there was violence it arose out of calculation as it were? It was fairly cold and calculated? Is that a fair reading rather than an instinctive response? - Yes, it appears from the evidence I have that it was planned and it was cold and calculated.

I don't want to misrepresent what you have said? - No, I would agree with that.

RE-EXAMINED BY MR. LAKE: Just to return to a matter which was raised as possible confusion yesterday afternoon. In the conclusion of your first report you conclude that psychological risk assessment/assessment would not provide a satisfactory basis for the prediction of violent behaviour in individuals of a community, is that correct? - That is correct, yes.

That is both because of the accuracy rate of such tests in a community setting? - Yes.

Or because of the practical difficulty in carrying out sufficient tests? - That is correct.

At the same time, I think you said in your evidence that certain factors, the ones you take into account in assessing that Hamilton could suffer from a sadistic personality disorder, might have been sufficient to ring alarm bells in relation to both the possession of firearms and having care of children? - Yes, indeed.

In a situation where you might not regard these as being sufficient to permit you to predict violence, on what basis do you consider that they would have rung alarm bells for you? - Well, I would be concerned that someone like that would have access and the opportunity to engage in paedophilia or to have access to handguns.

On/

11.00 a.m.

On what basis would you be concerned that they had access to handguns? What would your concern be if they had access to handguns? - Are we talking about sadistic characteristics?

Someone who displayed the characteristics which you have taken into account? - What characteristics? Say psychomatic personalities?

If I refer to the characteristics in particular, I think they are contained in the second of your two reports and they run from the foot of Page 7 through Page 8 to the top of Page 9, and I think those are matters I put to you yesterday in regard to ringing alarm bells, and you said yes? - Yes.

Why would someone who displayed those characteristics give you concern if they were to hold a firearm? - Well, it seems to me that they enjoy dominating other people and humiliating other people, and the use of the firearm potentially could be used for that purpose.

And is that because all the characteristics come together or is it any one of them would produce that? - The characteristics of sadistic personality disorder?

The ones enumerated here? - Well, they are all linked; they are all inter-correlated; they tend to occur together because it is a cluster syndrome, so the fact that he has a particular way or style of inter-acting with other people would make me concerned.

And that concern would exist notwithstanding the fact you didn't feel able to say that you would predict this as being someone who would commit a violent act? - Yes; it is a different threshold of concern.

I think you said in response to a question by my learned friend, Mr. Campbell, we are dealing with two different things here, and these two different things you have in mind, on the one hand predicting violence and on the other hand safety/safety with a firearm? - Yes, I think these are two distinct concerns, yes.

I don't want to push you into saying more than you wish here, but do you feel able to say that even although you might be able to provide an accurate prediction of violence, you could identify people who would raise concerns that they would have firearms by psychological means? - Yes, I think you could, but you would have a very high "false positive" rate. Supposing someone comes along and they are experiencing major psychotic symptoms or are psychopathic, psychopathic people don't always go on to be violent, but would be a risk factor, and I would suggest that those people should be excluded from having firearms, but it doesn't mean that I would necessarily predict that that individual would go on to be violent, but that class of individual is at a higher risk than other people.

I may be asking too much, but could you estimate what proportion of "false positives" might arise if such a broad approach was to be taken to excluding people from having Firearms Certificates? - I don't have the necessary information about personality disorders in the general population.

Is that something which might be available in the document that is published next week? - From the American situation, but I think those are different. We know there is great cross-cultural differences in the rate of psychopathic personality disorders, much higher in North America than in this country, fortunately.

Fortunately for us? - For us.

If I could refer you now to the report on Hamilton? - Yes.

On Page 8, at the end of the paragraph relating to Hamilton getting amusement or pleasure from the suffering of others, you say in the sentence there "There is no evidence of cruelty to animals"? - That I am aware of.

to engage in something called "bunny hunts" where he would go out in his car trying to catch rabbits in the headlights trying to startle them and then run them over? - I wasn't aware of that.

Would that be a material factor in your consideration? - He was doing this as an adult presumably?

A young adult? - Yes, that would cause me some concern, yes.

Do you consider the events of the 13th March indicate a sudden and dramatic deterioration in Hamilton's -- it might be colloquially said that he had flipped -- or part of a continuing process? - I think it is probably part of a long-term process. I think he had personality difficulties. There was evidence that he was planning this at least two months beforehand, tentative evidence of that, so I don't think he flipped, no.

Taking the factors you do know about Hamilton's behaviour in relation to children? - Yes.

Which I think we have had referred to as being elements of cruelty in hitting them, a lack of care, if those matters were made known and referred to a Council, would you be able to advise them after an interview or certain other investigations as to the suitability of that person having access to children? - It depends on the quality of the information you get and the extent to which the person being interviewed cooperated at the interview. I think, as I indicated yesterday, paedophiles, even those who are convicted, will deny their behaviour, so it is very difficult to determine from an interview.

If it is a matter on which the local authority had expressed some concern, and said to someone he would not be permitted access to children unless he were to submit to interviews, and he would not be allowed access until someone in your position expressed that they were satisfied that it was safe for him to do so, do you think you would be able to express such satisfaction that it was safe for him ever? - In a sense it depends what investigations I am allowed to do.

What/

What investigations would you require to do? - I would need detailed information from background sources and I would need to be able to interview the individual for some considerable time and I would need to use some indirect measure of sexual arousal such as we referred to.

And that was quite intrusive? - Yes; penile measurements in response to pornographic pictures.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you, Professor. I am very much obliged to you for your evidence and the very great amount of work you have put into your two reports.

HUGH DILAHAY DAVIES (67), Sworn:

And are you the immediate past President of the Association of Police Surgeons? - That is correct, sir.

What age are you? - 67.

What are your professional qualifications? - Master of Arts; Batchelor of Medicine; Batchelor of Surgery, and holder of the Diploma in Medical Jurisprudence.

How long have you been practising medicine? - Since 1955.

And how long did you practice as a police surgeon? - 37 years.

Have you now retired from that? - I am retired as the Principal Police Surgeon to the Northamptonshire Force, but I am still used as consultant by Northamptonshire & Warwickshire Police, and occasionally other police forces.

Are you used independently as a consultant by those acting for say the defence of an/

an accused? - Oh yes.

In that capacity, do you describe yourself as an independent consultant forensic medical examiner? - I do.

That is an expression I don't think we are very familiar with in Scotland. Is it an expression, "Forensic Medical Examiner" which is used commonly in England? - It's now becoming more common. It started with the Metropolitan Police about 10 years ago when they re-named their police surgeons forensic medical examiners because the doctors and the police did not want to be seen as being too partisan to the police.

So it was a cosmetic change of name? - A cosmetic change of name; I think up here in Scotland they are still called police surgeons.

To be a police surgeon, do you need to belong to the Association? - No. The membership of the Association is for police surgeons, but there are a large number of doctors who are in general practice, and unfortunately do not do much police work and they do not need to join the Association. This is a view of course with which I do not hold.

Are your members largely full-time police surgeons then? - No; our doctors are generally medical practitioners who have taken extra post-graduate study in forensic medicine in order to deal with the work that they do.

So is there a normal additional qualification to do the job of police surgeon? - Yes; the qualification which you should have is the Diploma in Medical Jurisprudence.

And is that organised by one body, or can that qualification be obtained in a number of places? - No, it's only obtained in London through the Society of Apothecaries, but they do also -- the Society does have examinations in Australia, and they are this year having an examination in Hong Kong.

So can I take it from what you have said so far that the majority of police surgeons in the country are General Practitioners who do the job of police surgeon part-time as an additional element in their/

their practice? - That is correct.

Their experience will therefore vary according to where they are really? - It will indeed.

Can you tell me the size of the Association, the membership? - Yes, just over 1,000.

And can we compare that with the number of police surgeons there are in the United Kingdom? - Well, it is difficult to be accurate on this, particularly as in some areas the police do not appoint police surgeons with a contract, but they call on the occasional general practitioner to come occasionally to do the work.

We estimate that there are something like 2,000 members who are called upon by the police to render medical aid.

The reason you have been invited to give evidence here is to see whether there is a role for the police surgeon and indeed the general practitioner in the process of deciding whether or not a person should have a Firearms Certificate. Now, you will be familiar yourself with the role that a general practitioner, quite apart from a police surgeon, may play in that process at the moment. He may be in the category of person who might sign or countersign an application for a Firearms Certificate in the sense of supporting the application, but we have heard some evidence already in the Inquiry that there are circumstances in which the police may obtain consent from an applicant or holder of a certificate and approach his general practitioner for information. Now, do you have any direct experience personally of dealing with applicants for Firearms Certificates and either supporting their application or providing information to the police for their consent? - Yes, I have, considerable, because I live in a country area outside Northampton and I think I have been signing and countersigning applications for Firearms Certificates for many years.

Does the role of the doctor as a potential countersignatory create any difficulty for him in his practice? - It isn't personally to me, but I could quite easily see how it could, and I personally would be -- I agree with doctors that we really/really shouldn't do this job of countersigning.

Why do you say that? - Well, it could upset the doctor/patient relationship. If one of the people that I have signed certificates for -- if I had said to him "Look, I don't think you should have a certificate because you are mentally unstable; you have got a short fuse", he may well -- it would first of all break up the relationship, but he might even be the sort of person who could take revenge on me.

So/

11.20 a.m.

So it then places us in an uncomfortable position. I think the only thing you can do under these circumstances is make up some excuse as to why you can't do it.

You will be aware that the medical profession in general through the BMA in particular have expressed concern about being involved in some positive role in the process of certification for firearms holders, and I take it you understand that concern? - I do.

We will perhaps explore later this morning whether there is a negative rather than a positive role for the doctor. Am I right in saying that the Association which you represent see a role for its members in the process? - Yes, we do.

Will you tell us what is the role that you envisage for your members? - Have the Court got the document I handed in this morning, the flow chart of our ideas?

Yes. This will be R66. Do you have your own copy?
- Yes.

That is the one which shows the things which you envisage taking place? - That is correct.

Would you find it best to use this in illustrating how you see the police surgeon playing his part in the process? - I would like to refer to this.

Please do, and take us through it? - We see in the Association that the police surgeon or forensic medical examiner, that is the medical examiner to the Chief Constable, can play a useful role as a preliminary medical screener. By this we mean that when the person applies for a firearm, in his application form it would include the bona fide reason for the need to have a firearm, such as occupation, field sports, member of a gun club. In addition to including that reason the application form should have a medical questionnaire which the applicant can fill in.

Yes? - This medical questionnaire would be similar to the type of thing which was filled in when you apply for a life insurance or a sickness insurance policy, and of course there would be legal penalties for false declarations or failing to disclose? - Yes. That questionnaire would be seen by the police surgeon, and with that he would write to the person's general practitioner or any other appropriate doctor who is mentioned in the questionnaire, and get a medical report.

Yes? - We envisage that the vast majority of medical reports, there will be no problems, and we can inform the Chief Constable that there are no problems, medical problems, with this application.

Can I interrupt you at that point to establish what information you envisage getting from the named doctor at that stage? - Any serious illnesses, particularly illnesses which might affect one's mental capacity. Also, there is an advantage. If one is writing to a general practitioner, that general practitioner as a family doctor has an insight into the personality of the person making the application. For instance, he may, to use a phrase I have used before, have a short fuse, he might lose his temper quickly, he might beat up his wife or kids, there may be something about him which the GP would like to communicate to another doctor, but at the moment under the present system he is unable to do so.

Now, this would require a specific form of mandate to be completed in the application form; is that correct? - That is correct.

And it would also involve the GP or family doctor not having to make a judgement himself? - That is correct.

However, it does also involve inviting him to say things about his patient which are to some extent based on general experience of him rather than answering a medical question; is that right? - To a certain extent, yes.

Now, whether or not you get that information I presume might depend on the particular general practitioner? - Yes; there would be some variety./

variety.

There could be no way of compelling the disclosure of that sort of information? - No. I think GPs as a whole take their public duty seriously, and as with people who drive cars who are medically unfit, they do tend to try and persuade the patient to report his medical condition to the DVLA at Swansea, or if the patient does not do so the GP does it himself.

I think we are envisaging here a mandate authorising the GP to disclose information to you as a police surgeon; is that right? - Yes.

And therefore once the mandate goes to the GP you would expect him to answer that question, I presume? - I would. And if he felt uneasy, if the GP felt uneasy, I would expect him to tell me. But it is on a doctor-to-doctor basis; there is nobody else involved. Quite often doctors do talk between themselves. In fact when you are referring a patient to a specialist you quite often say things to the specialist you wouldn't say or wouldn't necessarily say to the patient you are seeing.

Now, if we have reached the stage that there are no problems, as you have described it in your flow chart, I take it by that you mean there is no obvious reason to suggest the applicant is unfit to hold a firearm certificate? - That is so.

It is a negative statement rather than a positive one, to the effect that he is fit to hold a certificate; or do you envisage going that far? - I would say from the past history. I don't think it is practically possible to have a full medical examination of every person who applies for a certificate. Apart from the logistics of the thing there is the fact that even a full medical examination by one doctor cannot visualise how a person is going to turn bad later and do something, as has happened here.

Yes? - What I can say is that at least we have done a medical screening, and we have not let somebody through who has got a history of mental illness, schizophrenia, many of the things that would in my opinion be an indication against holding a firearms certificate.

We/

We have been listening to some psychological expert evidence in the last few days telling us how difficult it is to forecast that a person might be violent and how difficult it also is to forecast that a person might demonstrate paedophile tendencies towards children. Bearing that in mind, it is quite difficult to imagine a doctor, even a police surgeon, being able positively to say "This is a man who is fit to hold a certificate", whereas it is easier to understand him saying that there is no obvious reason why he should not hold one? - You have summed it up very well. I entirely agree you cannot say this person cannot turn violent; you can't.

We have got to the stage where the person at the initial screening has demonstrated no obvious signs which render him unfit. If that is not easily determined, what further stages do you envisage in this process? - I think further changes would be either any medical records from a hospital, hospital records, reports from specialists he has seen, and it might be necessary to examine or interview the applicant yourself: I have left that open.

What do you mean by that? - I visualise that possibly rather than one doctor doing it the appropriate specialist might be involved as well, so that there is some further diagnostic exercise.

I think you have actually gone as far as to put in a suggestion of a final medical panel? - That is what I would say, a specialist and a police surgeon. For example, in a case where I suspected there was some mental instability or a short fuse I would sit with a forensic psychiatrist and interview the chap with the forensic psychiatrist probably taking the lead.

Now, you have suggested also in your presentation here the change in the way you envisage the law working at the moment? - Yes.

And you suggest it should be incumbent upon an applicant to prove positively that he is fit to hold a firearms certificate rather than incumbent on the Chief Constable to be satisfied he is not fit; is that right? - That is correct.

And I take it that that suggestion is there/

there because of this whole scheme that you propose, which involves a fairly detailed examination of the fitness of the individual?
- Yes.

So that if he fails he does not get the certificate because he has not passed the test, the onus on him, to demonstrate his fitness; is that correct? - That is correct, yes.

All right. So we go through the whole screening. There are a number of possible results at the end of the more detailed process that you envisage. Can you tell us what the possibilities are? - The possibilities are that somewhere along the line you may decide there are no medical problems, and you will inform the Chief Constable that there are no medical problems.

Yes? - There are of course other investigations going on on the police side, and it is the Chief Constable's decision. He has got his police evidence to weigh up as well, and he will certainly have yours, that there appear to be no medical problems.

Yes? - On the other hand, if the medical panel felt that there was a risk or that the person was not medically suitable to hold a licence we would tell the Chief Constable that he was not medically suitable. Now, because of the point of confidentiality we would in these circumstances not give a reason: all we would say is that the patient is not medically suitable.

Now, these are two fairly clear-cut situations. What about the position where you could not put your finger on medical unfitness: you have a plausible applicant -- we have heard psychological evidence that if he is a paedophile he will be plausible and that he will lie to you -- but you have got this gut feeling that there is something there that you cannot nail. How do you deal with that? - That is a difficult problem. I see no answer to it. I am sure you will get cases like that, and I honestly cannot answer that question. But at least you have made some medical enquiry; you have made an effort.

I wonder if the answer is not in your scheme at the moment. If the onus is on the applicant/

applicant to demonstrate his fitness and he has not satisfied you, but you could not actually pin down a specific medical reason, do you see a basis for you, acting responsibly, still saying that you are not satisfied of his fitness? - I think so.

Or is that one that would present your members with real difficulty? - I really don't know the answer to that question for my membership. Speaking for myself, however, I think I would certainly err on the side of caution.

Now, can I ask you to look at the second page of your submission? - Yes.

You have actually told us more or less what is here. In the second numbered paragraph you mention the way in which the material would be obtained from the GP, by using a form similar to that currently used for life assurance medical reports or by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Authority, but tailored specifically for the purpose of firearms licensing? - Yes.

Now, can you help us with information about the sort of form used by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Authority? - I have not filled in one of these for many years now, but to the best of my memory the form is filled in by the applicant, and it asks various questions, such as "Do you have any loss of consciousness?" and things like that.

Yes? - This form goes to the DVLA. The DVLA doctors then write to the GP, and they write specifically, saying that the person has mentioned this on his application form, "Can you elucidate further?".

So it is a form used and triggered by the applicant himself disclosing his medical condition? - Yes, indeed.

Now, in relation to firearms licensing am I right in thinking that you envisage the automatic use of this form of enquiry? - Yes. Not necessarily the same form as the DVLA, but one tailored for this situation.

But they are only dealing with particular cases; you would be dealing with every applicant for/

for a firearms certificate? - Yes.

In paragraph 3 you mention at the end that in your assessment you should also be supplied by the police with any other non-medical evidence thought to be relevant? - Yes.

So you envisage the police providing you with information before you advise the Chief Constable? - Yes. The two investigations are going on in parallel, the medical investigation and the police enquiries, and again the police may have some information which is relevant.

And you also in paragraph 5 mention the need for frequency of examination; is that right? "This system should operate as frequently as reasonably practicable"? - Yes.

And it is suggested at one stage that an annual renewal is one possibility, or legislation could be framed so as to place the onus on the GP to advise the police surgeon if the holder of a certificate became for example mentally unwell, or other circumstances had changed? - Yes.

So you envisage either a more regular renewal of the certificate than we have at present or a duty on the GP to tell the police surgeon if certain things change? - Yes.

Now, that raises difficulties of defining the circumstances you envisage having to be disclosed. Is there some easy way to identify these? - First of all, it is very much a matter of political will: but the most important thing is that they have been granted a certificate, and if there is any medical condition that comes up during the time, whether it is for one, two, three years, that medical information should be divulged, preferably by the applicant, but if not, as with driving cases, if the patient does not divulge it then the GP has a duty to do it himself under the provisions.

If we take driving as an example for the moment, is there some sort of recognised category of conditions that have to be disclosed? - Oh, yes; epilepsy is one, loss of consciousness and sudden loss of consciousness, eyesight changes.

Now, /

Now, in relation to firearms what sort of information do you envisage having to disclose, starting with the applicant disclosing them? - Treatment for any mental illness.

Anything else? - Severe body illness, not mental illness, which might affect his clear thinking.

Now, one of the problems you have identified about this whole area is that there are statutory obligations nowadays on doctors to tell patients what they are telling other people? - Yes, that is Access to Medical Reports Act and the Access to Medical Records Act. We feel that anybody involved in this process should have exemption from those Acts.

The very last thing you mention in your submission is a central firearms licensing and registration agency similar to the DVLA. Now, what advantage do you see in the process that you envisage for having such a centralised body? - Well, I think if for example you are refused a licence in Scotland and you come down to Northampton then we would be able to, through a central agency, find out that you had been turned down by another authority.

People quite frequently move from one area to another. Do you envisage that to present a problem unless there is some centralised way of recording information which has been obtained about individuals in the course of the licensing process? - Well, yes, particularly travelling communities. People travel all over the country and move from place to place. This would be a way of keeping a check on them.

Do you think police surgeons with their current experience are well placed to do this job or are we talking about starting now a long learning process? - Well, I think in the position they hold and have held for many years as medical advisers to their Chief Constable they are in a good position. I think there will have to be some learning process but I think at least you have got people in the position physically, also being almost in the same office as the Chief Constable. You have got the people there who can be trained further. When eventually the procedure is decided, they can be trained to put it into operation.

examination or do you think that it is something that should be done by all of them? - No, I think it will be the equivalent in the Police Forces to myself. I was the principal police surgeon of the Northamptonshire Police. It would be myself and my depute rather than every police surgeon in Northamptonshire.

I think there are examples in Scotland of full-time police surgeons, in Strathclyde in particular? - Yes. I think in that situation of course a full-time police surgeon would do it. There are in England some, not officially full-time but they spend more time on police surgeon work than any other work. There are more and more of them now, particularly in the larger cities. About three-quarters of their time is spent with Police Forces.

One other problem I would like to ask you about is we have heard some evidence already of cases where individuals who don't hold Firearms Certificates do things which have an obvious relevance to whether or not in the future they should get a Firearms Certificate. For example, they make threats to use firearms against animals or people. Do you see any way of keeping tabs on that type of information if it comes into the hands of either a general practitioner or a police surgeon and relating it then to any future application for a Firearms Certificate? - It is very difficult to keep tabs on that sort of information. Probably the police are more experienced at that than we are because of their contacts with people and domestic violence.

So that depends on relaying information through the criminal intelligence system? - Yes, indeed. Mind you, there could be a contribution certainly in the domestic violence situation that general practitioners could make because we do occasionally deal with families where there is quite a bit of domestic violence and threats going on.

Yes, I am envisaging a situation where either something about a firearm crops up or you know that the person is likely at some future stage to apply for a Firearms Certificate. Then it might be appropriate to expect somehow or other doctors to relay that information to police intelligence? - I would/

would hope so and that could be done without them breaking their confidentiality by them contacting the police surgeon on a doctor-to-doctor basis.

Now, the only other particular issue I want to raise with you is the extent to which you envisage surgeons being capable of making assessments about a person's mental rather than physical state in an examination because I assume that while you will all receive some general training as students in psychiatry and psychology, is that right? - Yes.

Very few will have any specialist knowledge of these subjects? - Well, I think one would have to admit the level of one's own competence or incompetence and if you have a case where you are uneasy about this then that is a case that should be referred to a psychiatrist. A forensic psychiatrist preferably.

And that is why you envisaged this panel of interviewers including a forensic psychiatrist? - Yes.
Or perhaps a psychologist? - Yes.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. CAMPBELL: Can we look for a moment at R66, the flow document. Has this document been circulated amongst other members of the Association for their comment and approval? - The document itself has not. The original document was a working paper produced by one of our members and was debated at the Council of the Association on the 9th of May at which I was present. I was Chairman of the Council. That is the paper that we based it on. This flow chart is a simplified version of that.

So is the answer to my question no, it has not been circulated? - No, it has not been circulated to all 1,000 members but the Council of the Association has met the Regional representatives which is 20 strong. There are representatives from each Region and we discussed it at the Council meeting. The Annual General Meeting was the day after the Council and they voted that we should proceed with it.

So how many out of the thousand members would be present when that was debated? - There were/

were 20 at the Council meeting and the Annual General Meeting I think was about 200. Well no, 150.

Has there been any consultation with other interested parties, for example the BMA? - Yes, we brought it up to the Forensic Medicine Sub-Committee of the BMA and they were in general agreement with us. There was some concerns expressed about confidentiality but I think the BMA delegation representative will deal with that. The BMA are happy as long as communication is on a doctor-to-doctor basis.

And would the exercise be carried out by any qualified police surgeon? - I don't envisage that. I think we envisage it to be carried out by the senior police surgeon, the principal police surgeon in the Force. Senior, whatever you like to call him. Each Force has got one. The leading or principal police surgeon and his depute.

You have told us that you have counter-signed applications for Firearms Certificates for many years? - Yes.

What was it that resulted in you counter-signing applications for Firearm Certificates for many years? - Well, because the doctor is one of the named Council signatories and for some reason they don't want to go to someone responsible like their bank manager or the other people named on the list. They always tend to choose the doctor and I was a village doctor so naturally the farming community and the villagers around used to come to me.

If we look at R66 for a moment on the second page and paragraph 3. The advice is that there should be a reversal of the presumption of law which at present assumes a person is a fit and proper person to hold a licence unless determined otherwise. Can we infer from that that it is your experience that the law is operated at present on the basis that there is a presumption in favour of granting? - Yes, that is what I feel because I do know that in the County of Northamptonshire that sometimes where a person is not granted a certificate then they do appeal to the Crown Court to see if they can have that reversed. It doesn't happen/happen often but it does happen.

So the system is operated with that in the back of the policeman's mind? - Yes.

We have heard evidence that Hamilton had not been to his G.P. for more than 20 years so the system which you are discussing would not have played much of a part in this particular case? - It would seem not to be, no.

BY LORD CULLEN: Just to take up that point. How would you cope with a situation of that sort where a patient had been rarely in contact with his doctor? - If the patient had been rarely in contact with his doctor I think this would be a case where I would want to meet him and see him. You know he would be one of the cases that I would call up for interview.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. GIBB: We have heard from Professor Cooke this morning, a forensic psychiatrist, that his view is that four or five meetings at least would be needed before it would be possible to do any risk assessment on the psychiatric side. I mean, physically is it possible if a police surgeon is involved in that amount of involvement with so many firearms applications? - No, it is not physically possible but I think if you do interview somebody and, as you say, four or five times to do a proper psychiatric assessment, I think that is where I would refer them to a psychiatrist.

BY LORD CULLEN: Presumably you would not go on to that stage unless you had sufficient concern to advance to that, is that right? - That is what I mean, yes.

RE-EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMOY: Simply one question on timing here. In your experience is it the fittest members of the community who don't see their doctors very often or can you draw any conclusion about fitness from the fact that a person does not go to his doctor? - That is a very good point and I have not really thought about it until now but in my experience I have a regular number of people that I have signed certificates for. They are usually fit people, farmers and gamekeepers, and so I very rarely see them as a doctor. I usually see/see them socially. So, yes, some of my people I only see when I sign their certificate.

BY LORD CULLEN: Just one point; I know to some extent you have touched on this already but can you perhaps sort of crystallise for me what you think would be the merit of introducing police surgeons or forensic medical examiners into the scene that we are discussing? - Well, I think it is not a perfect screening system but at least it is an effort at doing medical screening without involving the patient's general practitioner in a face-to-face confrontation with his patient and also giving at least somebody that the Chief Constable can turn round to for medical opinion.

Of course, I suppose you could have a system in which every G.P. was required to submit the kind of report that you were talking about to the Chief Constable and what you are talking about is what is done with it, is that right? You say that is where somebody in your position would have a role to play? - Yes, because the G.P. cannot do a report on his patient to the Chief Constable because of medical confidentiality.

Well, would there be a difficulty about obtaining consents, if there was proper consents given in advance, for the applicant to agree to that being done, or do you see that great difficulties would arise there? - I can foresee difficulties in getting consent for medical information to be divulged to a non-medical person, namely the Chief Constable. The parallel is insurance companies. They insist on medical information but at least the patient, when he fills in his insurance application form knows it is looked at by the insurance doctor, a doctor in the insurance company.

So you are keeping it so to speak contained within a system which does not mean that the information is fully divulged but that it will eventually come to the Chief Constable as a statement as to whether a person is or is not medically suitable? - That is how we envisage it.

And you are acting as a means of determining to what extent any further action is required and if so, what that is? - Precisely.

ARTHUR/

ARTHUR MORRIS, (55), Sworn,

EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMY: Are you on the Council of the British Medical Association? - Yes, I am.

Do you hold a position as Chairman of a sub-committee? - I'm the Chairman of the Scottish Council of the British Medical Association. That is the Council for the Scottish BMA. That in itself I think is a sub-committee of the main Council of the BMA U.K.

And are you actually on the main Council? - Yes.

How long have you been a medical practitioner? - For 30 years.

What are your professional qualifications? - My professional qualifications are M.A., M.B., B.C.H.(I.R.), F.R.C.S.(Edin.) and F.R.C.S. (England).

Are you currently in practice? - I am currently in practice.

As? - As a consultant plastic surgeon.

Can you tell me what the BMA is? - The British Medical Association is a professional organisation representing and having as its membership medical practitioners. It is a large organisation. It represents or its members constitute over 100,000 doctors and it is a very sizeable proportion of the whole medical practitioners of Great Britain. It is probably over 80 per cent plus. In some speciality divisions it is more. Almost 90 per cent.

And that means that it represents not just general practitioners but it represents specialists such as yourself? - Yes, a whole range of medical specialists, what we call crafts. That representation, if I can just enlarge, is done via a divisional system basically which is arranged into divisions locally throughout the United Kingdom and this divisional system is represented in two ways; directly through committees but also through annual representative meetings where one or two representatives/representatives of each division can put forward discussion.

And that is going on this week? - This week in Brighton.

Has it finished? - It finished yesterday, yes.

There/

12.00 p.m.

There is also a body called the General Medical Council; can you tell me what that is please? - The General Medical Council is the statutory body which registers medical practitioners for them to be able to undertake their job as doctors.

Are they the disciplining body at the end of the day?
- Disciplining is part of their remit, yes.

Now, you have had the opportunity of listening to the evidence this morning for, I suspect, fairly obvious reasons, and I think it has been of some assistance to you to have heard particularly Dr. Davies. Have you found that helpful? - Yes.

One of the things I asked him about was the difficulty a doctor might experience because he is asked to be a countersignatory to an application for a Firearms Certificate. Do you know if doctors generally find some difficulty in having to fulfill that role? - Yes; in the first place, doctors when acting as a countersignatory have to be seen as acting not in a purely medical capacity. They are acting in a personal capacity by reason of their standing as one of the eight listed professional groups that can countersign an application, and it is very important to make a distinction when doctors are acting in that capacity. Our concern, or the concern of a lot of doctors, is that by virtue of the doctor being a doctor, and having access to other information, that it should be thought that extra weight can be given on the opinion of the doctor who countersigns that signature, that application, and I would say that in Brighton there was considerable discussion about this particular problem in terms of one motion that was discussed, and that there is considerable division of opinion within the profession.

Did a policy emerge on this? - Yes.

applications. Now, the problem about that was that this was discussion and it was not -- there was no distinction made in the debate about the precise definition between personal capacity of a general practitioner and acting in a medical role in this process.

It might be complicated a bit further by the fact there are couple of medical questions on the application form? - Yes.

About mental fitness and epilepsy? - Yes. I don't have a form in front of me, but I think the doctor has to just countersign, and the applicant themselves fill in the 15 questions, or the 14 questions that's on it, and one of those is that the applicant has to show that they are not suffering from epilepsy and diabetes, I think it is.

Yes, but I think you have to countersign that you have no reason to..... We will get the form in a moment? - Yes, but a bank manager could do that as well, and a bank manager is one of those countersignatories.

Do you think a doctor is in any more invidious position as a countersignatory than for example a Member of Parliament in the sense of giving special endorsement to the applicant? - I would imagine that for example people that apply for gun licences would be youngish, fittish adults, and these are precisely the people that don't go to their general practitioner with illness generally in the main, and therefore I think the general practitioner may have no greater knowledge of the patient in that sense.

No, which is the difficulty that you are mentioning at the moment that I am concerned about, that you feel that you may be viewed as giving added weight over other types of people who are countersignatories simply because you are doctors, and may be expected to know a little more about the person, but you have to know the person to be a countersignatory and to know him for a certain length of time? - Yes.

And many other professions are asked as well to sign these, including Members of Parliament? - Yes.

Now,/

Now, do you think that your difficulty is not really one that is suffered by others as well in a slightly different way? - Yes, I understand the point, yes; I would agree with that.

You can perhaps have a look at one of the application forms, D91L is the one I have here, in L3. It will just be a moment in coming to you. Now, D91, if you have it there, that is an extract of an application form, and it has got a letter unfortunately in the middle of it, but if you can go past the letter, you will find the page with the countersignature at the bottom, Part F. Do you see that? - Yes.

And at the foot you will see that the countersignatory is certifying that "To the best of my knowledge and belief, the information given in answer to questions 1 to 15 above is true". Have you got that? - Yes.

And if you go back to the first page and look at Question 14, you will see mention of epilepsy and mental disorder? - Yes.

So I suppose you are being asked in a professional capacity as well as a personal capacity to say something about the applicant, and that is putting an extra burden on a doctor? - That is the concern of the profession.

You will see also that the second statement is "I know of no reason why the applicant should not be permitted to possess a firearm". Do you see that as perhaps expecting a doctor to say something professionally rather than simply personally? - This is the concern, that it might be seen as that from the public perception point of view, but technically the doctor is signing in the same status as any other professional.

One other difficulty Dr. Davies mentioned was in the relationship between patient and doctor, that because a doctor might from time to time on a personal basis have to say no, that that can cause difficulties in the professional relationship. Do you see that as a problem? - I could envisage that as a problem, yes indeed.

Have you yourself ever signed these forms?/

forms? - I think I have once signed a form.

Now, Dr. Davies has also outlined a proposed scheme in which contact would be made between a police surgeon and a general practitioner or other named doctor that an applicant had referred to in his application. Without really having to spell out what you have already heard this morning, can I have your reaction to that please? - Could you just repeat the precise point?

Yes; he outlined in his evidence this morning a scheme which would involve a police surgeon obtaining information from a patient's general practitioner, or other doctor that the patient has had contact with, named in his application form as a result of mandate to provide information. What did you make of that idea? - First of all, it would obviously require the patient's complete consent to any confidential matters of that nature.

That is probably not a problem because he will just be told he's not getting his Firearms Certificate unless he cooperates, so it is therefore fairly easy to get consent? - Yes.

So assuming we have got that? - Disclosure of the information -- it would then be very important that what happened to this information afterwards, because if this information was given from one doctor to another, as in for example an application for life insurance or something of that nature, it is specifically given to the medical officer employed in the Life Association Company rather than in general to the other employees in that Company, and it is very important that specific medical details are kept confidential. It is a very very important point.

I think he envisaged that happening also, so assuming that we can cope with that difficulty as well, could this work? - Well, I think the problem is that all one could say is it would have to be an extremely well constructed form, and all one could then talk about is what has happened up until that time. It's not a certificate of sanity for example. It cannot say that in the future something else might not happen, or something might change.

You/

You might have detected in the questions I put to Dr. Davies that I don't envisage for a moment a certificate that is framed in a positive way, that a person is positively okay to have a Firearms Certificate? - No.

I am talking about something that might say that "I don't know of anything that is obvious that renders him unfit". Now, assuming we are looking at it from that point of view, has this got some potential? - I think that would have -- yes -- you would have to err on the side of safety, I would think, and if the doctor basically had the slightest reservation that there might be something there, I think he would have to very carefully weigh up the position you have to put to the applicant that he might not be a suitable person to want to do it, or possibly to consider withdrawing the application, but if the applicant persisted, you can envisage a system where you might go through the system; you might try a separate route, and that would put you as a general practitioner in an extremely difficult position.

You mean go elsewhere? - Yes, try again elsewhere.

BY LORD CULLEN: So you would end up with the same problems as the countersignatory? - Yes.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY:
That would be of course because of the way you envisage actually trying to persuade the patient first of all to withdraw his application rather than give an adverse report to the police surgeon? - Yes. In this envisaged scheme, would every single applicant have to get a report made on them? This would be a routine thing?

That is what Dr. Davies had in mind; is that another difficulty? - It might be a logistical problem; it might involve a large amount of extra medical work.

Am I right in saying that the way you are looking at this, namely telling the patient first of all, or counselling the patient first of all that perhaps he should withdraw the application, is that the sort of thing you do with drivers? - With/

With driving licences, yes.

Who have come across a change in circumstances that renders them unfit? - Yes.

And your system there is to try to persuade them first of all, and only as a last resort to go over their heads and tell the Licensing Authority that this person suffers from a condition? - Yes, that is correct. There is the difficulty that the registered medical practitioner is registered with the General Medical Council and there is quite strict guidance on that. I understand some copies of that Guidance were sent?

We will come to that in a moment because I do want to ask you about it, but I suspect that bearing the events of the 13th March in mind, that if we are looking at such a scheme as this, some would suggest we should be looking at it in a very peremptory way so that when the consent for the disclosure of medical information is given, it should just be implemented rather than implemented only after a process of counselling the applicant to withdraw his application. If that were envisaged, do you see difficulties for doctors in the patient/doctor relationship? - Yes, I do. If the doctor was to say to somebody "I'm sorry, I can't agree to countersigning that", that could leave the patient, and in this case the applicant for a gun licence, with very little room for manoeuvre, and if it was the sort of person who might not be suitable to get a Firearms Licence in the first place, I think one could feel for the general practitioner putting himself at considerable risk in this type of situation.

It is important not to confuse the role of countersignature with this. We are talking about a quite separate report after the application form has been lodged when the police surgeon would contact you for information and send you a form? - Yes.

As he envisaged already happens in relation to insurance? - Yes.

And you would complete the form? - Yes.

He/

He also envisages you giving him information that you wouldn't be comfortable giving to the patient, your own views to some extent, your own anxieties about a particular patient. Would doctors be comfortable about relaying that type of information to another doctor? - Again, that would have to come under the General Medical Council type of Guidance on relaying information about that, because if that was not being disclosed to the patient what you were doing, and yet you were doing it to another doctor?

So that does present an ethical problem, does it? - No, it doesn't. The difficulty is it depends on whether there is an immediacy of danger or concern, and that would have to be weighed up by the individual practitioner.

So that would be the qualification. There would have to be an immediate danger? - No, not necessarily, but there would have to be justifiable reason. If we could refer to the actual.....?

Yes, I was going to give it an R number, which was going to be R68. The document has been circulated to Parties, and if you have it, it refers to the Guidance? - Yes, this is Guidance, confidentiality from the General Medical Council.

And which part are you referring to? - One section of the whole.....

Paragraph 18? - Paragraph 18, yes, "Disclosure in the interests of others".

And can you read that to us please? - "Disclosures may be necessary in the public interest where a failure to disclose information may expose the patient, or others, to risk of death or serious harm. In such circumstances you should disclose information promptly to an appropriate person or authority".

Is that what enables you to disclose information to the Driving and Vehicle Licensing Authority? - Yes, it is, yes.

The/

12.20 p.m.

The test at the moment would be the same? - The test would be similar, yes.

He also suggested that it would be helpful if doctors were under an obligation to disclose changes in the patient's condition that might affect their fitness to hold a firearm, and a disclosure might also be made to the police surgeon? - Yes. I think that would fall completely within paragraph 18.

So it would have to be on that basis? - Yes.

One of the submissions you have presented to the Inquiry is a letter sent to the Home Affairs Committee investigating similar issues, which refers to the guidance from the General Medical Council and points to circumstances actually occurring, particularly in rural areas, where doctors do learn of the development of deteriorating judgement in patients and do disclose this information? - Yes.

That submission goes on to say that it would be helpful to have a scheme similar to the one which operates for drivers with the DVLA? - Yes.

It talks about a confidential telephone advice and information service. How does that operate? - That would be similar to the driving licence one.

How does that operate? - The driving licence one operates -- there is a helpline which is available, and the medical practitioner rings up the helpline and asks to speak to one of the medical advisers. They can speak to one of the medical advisers to discuss the medical condition of the patient. Following discussion with the doctor, if appropriate the medical adviser sends an application form to the patient to complete, and if that is not returned to the DVLA then the licence is revoked.

Do you envisage an identical arrangement in relation to firearm certificates? - Yes, the same in principle.

I think the crucial difference in what Dr./

Dr. Davies was proposing was that all of this disclosure would be with consent, that you would really not be into the area of the application of the GMC guidelines at all; you would be operating in a situation where the patient has said -- obviously, because he is not going to get his firearm certificate otherwise -- that you can disclose anything? - Yes.

Now, why should that simply not be done? - Yes, you could do that. There might be something in that. There is talk of this gut feeling that something else might be there. To put that down in writing would be extremely difficult.

It is a matter for a doctor's judgement about what he can disclose within the terms of the mandate; is that not right? - Yes.

Some doctors will be more comfortable than others about disclosing certain types of information, as in any other area of human experience? - Yes. From discussion this week at the BMA, some doctors expressed the opinion that they should be conscientious objectors, as it were, and not have anything to do with the signing of applications. Now, that would create difficulties again for getting in the medical report. In that case it would have to go to an independent person, not the GP.

If we assume for the moment that there will be a form of regulation of firearms that involves the applicant obtaining a certificate, and if we assume for the moment that a person should only get a certificate if there is no obvious reason or no reason established from a medical examination why he should be regarded as unfit, then would the person who is the current general practitioner not be the doctor best placed to advise of problems? - In some respects yes, but in some respects no.

If he has not seen the patient I can understand him saying "I cannot tell you"? - Yes.

But we have heard Dr. Davies say in that situation he would have to do the job? - Yes. I think there is a case for having an independent person, not the registered medical practitioner, fulfil this role.

You/

You mean in all cases? - In all cases, yes.

BY LORD CULLEN: How would that independent person be briefed about what the medical history was? - I think an independent practitioner would have to be briefed, but with access to medical records, in order to do that effectively.

So the GP records you would assume would be made available? - Yes.

And nothing more than that? Is there any possibility of discussing the matter with the GP? - I think we have to have the ability to discuss it with the GP as well.

In that case is there a problem? Because we were talking about a problem of consent. Even with consent there seemed to be a difficulty in the view of the existing guidelines, but what about discussion between the independent person and the GP? - I think if the original application is done with the patient's consent this removes a lot of the constraint on the individual medical practitioner.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY:
That is what he was putting forward to us? - Yes.

If that is right do you see a difficulty? Is it not caught by the strictures and the guidelines? Does it not go outside these? - Yes. The medical practitioners want to take part in the process for the sake of all individuals. They don't want to come across anything else like this. Doctors are feeling extremely strongly that in general they want to avoid the misuse of the firearms and the possession of firearms being misused. That is the over-riding factor.

You have made your position clear in your statement to the Inquiry, that you want to play your positive part in this. Can I be absolutely clear about the position of the confidential guidance? Paragraph 18 does not apply in circumstances where informed consent had been given by the patient for the disclosure of his medical history by his GP? - No, not if the patient has given his informed consent.

I/

I can see that you may in your representative capacity have difficulty for definite in speaking for all doctors today: but perhaps some of that is influenced by the views of doctors on handguns, which we should perhaps try to lay aside for the moment, and look at the problems which might be created for doctors if there remains a certification process which had to be carried out? - Yes.

Now, did your meetings this week pass any resolutions which would inhibit a doctor from participating in the process which Dr. Davies mentioned this morning? - Yes. This Motion 62 stated that "This meeting believes that doctors should not endorse gun licence applications", and if you take that to mean doing a secondary report, that would be it. But I could imagine it would not necessarily cover that.

Was that resolution related to being a counter-signatory? - It was related to the whole point of counter-signatories, yes.

But it would still have to no doubt receive the support of your membership, wouldn't it? Or do you think it is something you would have to go along with if that happened? - One problem is that this has arisen in a relatively short time scale to get full consultation. If this recommendation came out this would have to be discussed at future meetings. As it stands at the moment, it was a very small majority that carried that motion, and therefore I can foresee that a large body of the medical profession would be -- if it reflects the vote, roughly half the profession would carry out endorsing gun licences.

So this is not a motion which binds all members? - No. Because of the wording of it, really.

Now, do you have there a letter which was sent by your secretary to the Home Affairs Committee, dated 23rd April, 1996? - Yes.

On the second page of that you express concern about the relationship which is perhaps in the public perception between psychiatric illness and being a public danger with weapons. Now, is there such an obvious relationship as a layman think there/

there ought to be? - Between medical illness and danger?

Yes? - Not at all. I am talking here about representing practitioners in the BMA, not as a forensic psychiatrist. I think it is very important that we do not ally mental disease necessarily with a slur which suggests that people might be a danger to the public. I think there is a complete distinction between the two, and it is very important to make that clear.

Does that not point out the importance of involving doctors in the whole process of firearms specification? - I think a very important point to remember is that the general practitioner is a generalist; he is not a specialist in the risk assessment of the danger of someone carrying weapons. The general medical practitioner who signs the form is doing that on the basis of a generalist, who does not necessarily have any specialist training. Even if he had specialist training the prediction level is very uncertain. Even at the time when this is signed it is all right, circumstances can change that afternoon or the following morning.

That is why I think no one would ever ask you anything other than to say you know of no reason why a person is not fit to be entrusted with a firearm? - That is correct.

I take it a doctor can go that far? - Yes.

You have mentioned in the next paragraph anxiety about the relevance of many conditions that doctors see to firearms fitness, and these are some cases and conditions that a layman might suppose would have relevance to the fitness to hold a firearm certificate, and one you mention there is depression? - Yes.

What is the difficulty the doctors are expressing there? - I think the problem is that it is a question of what sort of depression, how deep is the depression. Again, to lump together a range of different conditions very broadly, I think everybody here would say they had at some stage been depressed. It is a sort of comparative term.

Does/

Does that not emphasise that if we are going to look to doctors to assist at all in the process there can be no boundaries or limits to the areas they are asked to comment upon? In other words, they should if asked be able to comment on the whole medical history of the individual, insofar as they consider it relevant to the question they are dealing with? - Yes, but I think it would be fair to say that specific questions would have to be framed. It would need almost a check-list in order that you did not miss one particular aspect.

I take it you would expect the police surgeons to devise a form and then consult you about its appropriateness? - Yes.

I don't remember if I have used this expression already, but we have heard the expression used certainly by Dr. Davies and others that in the circumstances we are envisaging here you ought to err on the side of public safety. Do you agree with that? - Yes.

I think in their submissions the BMA have been anxious to stress their concern for public safety? - Yes.

You have also I think made submissions to this Inquiry through your General Medical Services Committee? - Yes, that is correct.

And one of the things you have dealt with there is the logistical difficulty you mentioned earlier, that particularly in relation to the number of psychologists and psychiatrists that would be required to do psychometric testing of applicants? - Yes.

You will appreciate today we have been looking at a slightly different arrangement, in which a police surgeon would initially screen the applicants and the psychologist and psychiatrist would only become involved if he thought that was necessary? - Yes.

Obviously that is not as ideal as the full testing, but we have heard that psychometric testing is unlikely to be of particular assistance if done on a general basis? - Yes.

Do/

Do the BMA have any views on that? - I think one would have to go back to the distinction between the generalist nature of the GP and the police surgeon and their specialist knowledge. I am sure that workload is a problem. If you can imagine a general state of awareness after tragic incidents like here, I am sure GPs would look at things in much more detail, and much more doubt would arise in their mind, and I can envisage a situation where more second opinions from forensic scientists or psychiatrists would be sought. There could be a big logistic problem.

I wonder if you could look at R67, the interim firearms guidance note which the BMA have issued: have you got that? - Yes.

Can you tell me when that was issued? - It was issued in March, 1989, and it was revised in April, 1996.

Has the revised version been issued to your members, do you know? - It is available, yes.

Is it not issued automatically? - I don't think it has been posted out to each individual member.

But if someone wants guidance, that is the guidance they get? - Yes.

I am confused about one particular part, which is paragraph 11, under the heading "Patients who may be dangerous if controlling firearms": do you see that? - Yes.

Can you read paragraph 11, which is the guidance you give to doctors at present? - "In these circumstances doctors should consider breaching confidentiality and telling the relevant officer (The Chief Constable of the County or the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police) of their disquiet. In keeping with other situations, in which a doctor may consider breaching confidentiality, doctors must be prepared to justify their decision before the GMC or a Court, if necessary. The GMC guidelines of September, 1995 on confidentiality say that rarely, cases may arise in which 'Disclosures may be necessary in the public interest where a failure to disclose information may expose/expose the patient, or others, to risk of death or serious harm. In such circumstances you should disclose information promptly to an appropriate person or authority".

So that is guidance that you have given which reflects the GMC guidelines we were looking at earlier? - Yes.

Now, separately you have commented on the checking of adults who may seek to work with children? - Yes.

And you deal with this in a letter dated 24th May, 1996? - Yes.

And you say in that that you feel at present systems for checking whether an adult should be permitted to work with children are inadequate, as it is possible for a suspected individual to move from one Authority to another, and you are suggesting the establishment of a national register of suspected persons? - Yes.

So/

12.40 p.m.

So the principal concern there is obviously with the problem that comes when people move from one area to another, having been detected in one area possibly and moving into another one?

- Yes.

A national register of suspected persons; what do you have in mind? - Well, if I can perhaps enlarge on that?

Yes? - When this was done, the line of enquiry on what was going to happen was a little bit less sure. I think again there has to be a distinction between convicted persons, persons who have actually been convicted of some offence, and suspected persons because I think when we talk about suspected persons you are in a very grey area as to whether you suspect somebody or not and how severe the suspicion has to be before you can do something and this would be for debate. We feel that there would be some merit in having some sort of co-ordinating body who could collect, gather and accumulate information. It would have to be done on a totally confidential, very independent basis. It would of course have to be done very, very carefully and it would have to be done in such a manner that if anybody was wrongly put on such a list that there should be a way in which they can make sure that their name was completely expunged from a list of that nature.

Well, do you have in mind any way in which you could determine whether a person was satisfactorily recorded as a suspect? - Very difficult. No. It is totally prediction.

It is quite a desirable proposal you have. What I am trying to do is to establish whether there is any feasible way of implementing it? - Well, I think to err on the side of safety first. That would be one part of it.

Bearing in mind all you have said today, though, about the need for consent from patients before you disclose anything and the confidentiality guidelines you have, what you are really suggesting is a scheme which has no regard to that sort of thing at all and relies on no doubt rumour and speculation about individuals on the basis of untested/

untested information? - Yes, I think one would have to make a distinction there between this sort of register not being medically driven as it were. Not necessarily based on the doctor/patient relationship. We are not talking about a doctor taking a major or a part in this. We are talking about the sort of public. I can see that that does open up a completely different type of thing.

Well, the closest we have at the moment is police intelligence? - Yes.

Which is confidential information gathered by the police from all sorts of sources? - Yes.

And there may be something to be said for making that nationally available, to the police nationally? - Yes.

I wondered if you have something else in mind beyond that and a feasible way actually to implement it which I think we are all having difficulty identifying? - No. I mean, I don't think we could come up with a blueprint to give you a scheme to do that.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. CAMPBELL: Do you still have before you the submission to the Home Affairs Committee of the 23rd of April, 1996? - Yes, indeed.

I think you were asked in the course of your evidence-in-chief for the purposes of the questions you were being asked to put to one side the more general position adopted by the BMA in relation to these matters. I wonder whether it is possible to do that for these purposes. So let me approach the matter in this way. If we look at the second page of that document, the third-last paragraph, the last paragraph at the foot of the page, we read "In the absence of any clear scientific evidence upon which to base discrimination between persons who are and persons who are not likely to behave anti-socially while in the possession of firearms, it follows that any firearms policy needs to take account of the fact that in the present state of knowledge it is not possible from a medical viewpoint to assist in any real way with the prediction of those positively safe with firearms, nor those who are unsafe". Now, does/does that point of view play any part in the BMA's response to the suggestion that G.P.'s should be brought into the licensing process in a more direct fashion than they are at present? - Yes, it does because I think, as I said earlier, G.P.'s by their position are felt to have an extra knowledge which a generalist would not necessarily possess and that knowledge itself of forensic prediction is in itself an imperfect science. Very large margins of error are possible.

My learned friend, Mr. Bonomy, puts to you that this problem can be resolved by ensuring that the general practitioner is simply asked "Do you know of any reason why this person should not be given a Firearms Certificate?" as opposed to "Is it all right for this person to have a Firearms Certificate?"? - Yes.

Well, no doubt sitting round this table and thinking about it we can readily appreciate the difference between these two questions and the answers to them but is there a concern that these differences may not be appreciated by everybody up the chain in the decision-making process? - There is concern amongst medical practitioners in general about that position, yes.

Is there a risk that any certificate by a general practitioner will be misinterpreted as a green light? - I think there is that risk and that is the reason why, when it was discussed this week, a large body of general practitioners or practitioners were concerned about doctors entering into this process.

So does that have a further knock-on effect upon how a G.P. would assess what he was being asked to do? In other words, would he approach the matter on the basis of well, never mind what the actual question is, I have to bear in mind that the mere fact that I am being asked to answer this question and to put my name to this application may in some minds give the application a legitimacy which strictly it ought not to have for the reasons that we have read in your report? - Yes.

And then the G.P. is in a very difficult position because you have told us that he cannot reliably, positively, certify that person X will never/never act inappropriately with a firearm? - That is correct, yes.

So still on that paragraph that I was reading from before, do the considerations which we have just been discussing lead at least in part to what we read in the rest of that paragraph, "Our conclusion, sadly, is that until such time as methods are developed to provide reliable predictions, firearms policy needs to be based on the understanding that from time to time unpredictable behaviour will occur? - Yes.

And if we look at the letter which was sent to Mrs. McKeane on the 24th of May, 1996, do these considerations play any part in the view expressed in the short third paragraph on the first page of that letter, that the BMA would like to reiterate the point made to the Home Affairs Committee that members of the public should not be permitted to possess handguns personally? - Yes, the point made was that persons possessing them and retaining them was a risk.

Now, as the BMA points out in the remainder of that paragraph, whether that risk and tragedies such as Dunblane will be the price which should be paid in allowing legal access to firearms is something upon which presumably views will differ but the BMA recommends that the Government considers further tightening of the regulations? - Yes. If I can add again that there was another discussion at the meeting in Brighton and a motion was passed by a very large majority that it should be illegal for private individuals to use or possess automatic or semi-automatic weapons or handguns other than in establishments licensed for that purpose.

So bearing that in mind, is there another concern on the part of doctors that they might be asked to perform the impossible in effect? - There is a very considerable concern, yes.

And asked to do this in a context which might simply be facilitating something which they regard as inherently undesirable? - Yes.

And I take it doctors are fairly hard pressed, overworked individuals I suppose? - Yes. I think also you have to bear in mind that doctors themselves/themselves form a very wide group in society and some will own guns themselves and have gun licences and some will be at the other end of the spectrum and don't recognise that anybody should hold a weapon.

Conscientious objectors? - Yes.

RE-EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMOY: When you are asked to complete a medical examination and report in relation to insurance, are you giving a positive declaration that the subject will survive for a number of years? - I would have to say that I'm not a general practitioner. That is not my specialist subject at all but I have signed these forms as part of doing locum work. From my recall of that, you are actually signing to medical details and examination and I don't think an opinion is formed by the person filling in that form. That is performed by the company itself.

So you are answering details of what? - Details of the patients, their height, weight and previous medical history. The forms vary in their complexity. There are some simple ones but there are more detailed ones where they want a full medical examination, a sounding of the chest, blood pressure and a test of urine.

So you don't have to say whether there is any reason why a person should be denied insurance? All you do is answer straightforward factual questions? - I think again it depends on which type of form. They will be formed to different degrees. In some forms you would be asked to say there is no reason to believe. Some of them are just simply certificates where you just fill in and corroborate the details.

What I want to know is why a doctor may have difficulty in understanding the difference between saying positively that a person is a suitable and reliable person to have a gun and saying on the other hand that he knows of no reason why he should be declared unfit? Why should the doctor have particular difficulty understanding the difference between these two? - The difficulty between saying that the patient is unfit or saying that he knows no reason why not?

No, /

No, saying he is positively fit and ought to be given one and on the other hand saying you know of no reason why he should be regarded as unfit to have one? - Well, the difficulty there is that sanity or ability to do something is not a finite thing.

No, I understand that but why should a doctor find difficulty in understanding the difference between these two propositions? I am not suggesting you determine his sanity for all time? - I am sorry, can you repeat the point?

Well, you have just said to Mr. Campbell that there is some perceived difficulty amongst doctors. Well, I see heads shaking. I seem to have misunderstood this but I got the impression you were indicating that doctors felt they would be giving a positive endorsement seeking a gun licence if they answered any medical questions about him? - Yes, I think the point was, wasn't it, that the doctor by giving that was seen to be giving an extra type of endorsement, an extra approval.

I can understand that in the counter-signatory area but what Mr. Campbell then moved on to, away from the counter-signatory, forget about that, was into the area of the medical history of the individual being disclosed to a police surgeon. Now, where is the difficulty there that doctors would feel about somehow or other giving a positive approval to the applicant? - Well, I think the doctor would always feel a difficulty, even if he was trained in forensic psychiatry because it is a very inexact science. To give a positive approval that somebody is fit is an extremely difficult thing to do and a generalist couldn't do it.

I'm not suggesting that. All I am saying is that if you are posed with some questions about a person's physical fitness and these questions are designed to establish whether you know of any reason why he should be declared unfit and you answer these questions, how is that seen as giving some sort of positive approval of the person as being fit for the next five years to hold a licence? - Well, that is the thing. It would depend on what the form was you were actually filling in and signing. It is agreed you could only do it at that time and not reasons in the past. There is no difficulty about that./

that. The difficulty is a feeling amongst doctors that the fact a medical person has done that gives some extra substance to it. That is the point I was trying to make.

But is that you referring again to the counter-signatory? - Yes, the counter-signatory.

I am trying to get away from the counter-signature and to ask you about providing information to a police surgeon? - Yes.

Now, if you provide information which is factual and all you are additionally asked is to say that you know of no reason why the person should be regarded as unfit at present, at this minute, unfit, where do you see a difficulty? - No, I don't see a difficulty with that.

After/

2.00 p.m

After an adjournment for lunch.

LORD CULLEN: Yes, Mr. Bonomy?

MR. BONOMY: The next witness, sir, is Robert Moir.

ROBERT MOIR (52) Sworn

EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMY: Are you Robert Moir? - Yes.

Sergeant? - I am now Acting Inspector.

With Central Scotland Police? - Central Scotland Police.

What age are you? - 52.

And how long have you been with Central Scotland Police? - 25 years.

What was the first you ever heard of Thomas Hamilton? - Back in 1979. I was transferred down from Lochearnhead to Stirling and I heard him being discussed in general terms within the office, that there was some innuendo and suggestions that he may have been involved with young children, but there was nothing concrete.

Do you remember who was making the enquiry? - I think it was D.S. or D.C. Kindness at the time.

Did you speak to him about Hamilton? - Just in general terms.

Did you know whether anything was established at that time? - As far as I was aware, I was told that there was nothing concrete at all, nothing.

We have heard evidence from Kindness that he put an entry on the Intelligence system about that time. Were you aware of that? - No.

Did/

Did you know that Hamilton had a shop in Cowane Street in Stirling? - It wasn't until after a few years after that that I heard that he had a shop in Cowane Street.

After 1979, when was the next contact you had with him? - It was when I had become Chairman of the Dunblane Community Centre Council, which was responsible for the letting of the community halls within Dunblane, and he ran a youth club.

Was that a Council that dealt with letting within Dunblane High School? - High School, and the Braeport Centre.

Beside it? - No; the Braeport Centre is at a different part of the town.

So you dealt with both? - I dealt with both at that time.

When did you first go on to that Council? - I think it would be about '81/'82, round about then.

And were you working in Dunblane at that time? - Yes.

Were you stationed in Dunblane? - I was stationed in Dunblane.

So when did you first move to Dunblane? - I actually stayed in Dunblane when I moved down from Lochearnhead in 1977, but I worked in Stirling for a year and then I moved back up to Dunblane to work.

Do you still live in Dunblane? - Yes.

And have you lived there since you moved there from Lochearnhead? - I have.

Did you become Chairman as soon as you went on to that Council? - No.

When did you become Chairman? - That would probably be a couple of years after that.

In what capacity did you understand you were taking up office on that Council? - It was after/

after I went to Dunblane, they received a letter from the Youth and Community Officer who was based in the Braeport Centre, a full-time Council employee. They wrote to the police asking if they could send a policeman along to be part of the Committee dealing with the youth of Dunblane.

And you were sent along? - They asked for volunteers. I have been involved with youth groups before, so I volunteered to do it.

And when do you reckon it was you first encountered Hamilton in that connection? - He never turned up at the meetings. He would only occasionally turn up at the AGMs more or less and that would be it.

Was he on the Council? - Each user group had a representative. That was how the Council was made up, of user groups.

So when did you first meet him again, or when did you first meet him? - I believe it would be about May. That's when we usually held our AGM, so probably about '82, '83, round about there.

Did you do any checking on him at that stage? - No, because I had heard that he had been involved just prior to that with the Ombudsman for the Council and won his case, but I didn't actually do any checks on him at that time.

So it was after the Ombudsman episode that you came across him in person? - Yes.

You can take it that it was probably into 1985? - I heard it was going on, but I was never actually spoken to about this with the Ombudsman at all.

So you didn't make any further enquiry with Kindness for example to check up on him? - No.

You would be aware though on the Council that he was running or was anxious to run, rather, clubs within the High School? - He was, yes.

Do you know whether, when you first went on the Council, he was actually doing that, and it stopped after you went on the Council? - I believe he/

he was started because it was the policy of the Council that the youth clubs got priority of lets over anyone else, adult groups.

But we know his lets were suspended for a period? -
Yes, and shortly after that, they came back on, but it was the full-time leader more or less dealt with the lets at that time and it was only when any problems arose he would maybe raise it at an AGM or meeting.

But can you remember whether, when you first came on the Council, he was actually using premises? - I think that was the period he was stopped.

Who was the person responsible for deciding whether or not a group should get the use of either part of the school or the Braeport Centre? - At that time it was the full-time Youth and Community Officer.

Who was he? - Jim Gardiner at that time.

And preference had to be given to youth groups over adult groups? - That is correct.

After Hamilton won his case with the Ombudsman, how did the matter arise with the Council? - There was very little said about it other than he had went and he had to get the lets, which were granted, and I believe it was a Thursday night he got an hour and a half or two hours.

When the club resumed, did he advertise it? - Yes, there were letters went round.

Did you get one? - Yes.

Was there any anxiety among local people at that stage about resuming the club? - There was one -- I got several phone calls from residents, but I had spoken to someone and he said there was still nothing concrete against him.

Do you know who you spoke to? - I think it was the Criminal Intelligence Officer at the time, but I can't remember exactly who it was at that time.

And/

And what were the phone calls you were getting about? - Asking "This chap running the youth club, is it all right? We have heard a lot of stories about him".

What was your reply to that? - I said "To my knowledge I don't believe he has been convicted of anything", and left it at that.

Were you yourself running a club in Dunblane High School at that time? - Yes.

When did that start? - I got involved -- just after I went on to this group in '81, '82, I went along to help. They were short of leaders. It was a Monday night for younger children up to about 13 years of age, and I got involved with them, and it was about a year or two after that the older ones -- we started a Tuesday club which was for children from 14 up to 17, and they were running short of leaders so I went on and started running that.

So were you running both? - No, only the Tuesday club. I left the Monday club and went on to the Tuesday one.

Are you still running the Tuesday club? - No, I stopped.

How long ago was that? - Just over a year ago.

Did the Monday one continue? - Yes.

Did it do activities similar to those Hamilton claimed to be doing? - No, I wouldn't say we did the same.

What sort of activities were they? - They were doing like art work, handicrafts, as well as some gym, but the gym work wouldn't be physical training as such. It would be more like playing football, hockey, indoor hockey.

You moved to Balfron as an officer; when was that? - It would be about '85/'86; no, it was after that.

Roughly? - Yes, roughly about there.

Did/

Did you stay on in the position of Chairman of the Council? - Yes.

You encountered Hamilton in connection with your service at Balfron? - That is correct.

And that related to the camp at Loch Lomond in 1988? - Yes.

Between his getting the lets back in 1985 and 1988, was there anything happened in the running of his club that caused the Council concern? - No.

Tell me how you encountered him in 1988? - I was at Dunblane and we got a call from Dumbarton Police.

Were you at Balfron? - I was stationed at Balfron at the time, the Sergeant there, and we got a complaint this camp was being run for youths by a chap Tommy Hamilton, but they didn't say where he had come from. I didn't relate it was the same Tommy Hamilton I had known from Dunblane at that time, and he just said "We've got some complaints; they are out on one of the islands; could you send two officers out to check the island and the camp and see what it's like and report back", so there was a PC Gunn and a PC Sloan -- no, Duncan -- Sloan is her married name, and they both went, and reported back what they saw.

Have you any recollection of what their view of the camp was when they came back? - When they spoke about it when they left I said "Well, try and look at it how you feel with your own children". PC Gunn had children, but PC Duncan didn't have any so I said "Try and look at your own boys going to a summer camp, how would you find it and react if your own boys were at the camp", and left it at that, and they came back and said it wasn't the worst; they seemed to be running about; they were quite cold, in shorts all the time.

Their report would have to go back to Strathclyde Police? - That is correct.

Were you aware of action taken by Strathclyde Police? - Yes; they phoned us up and I made some enquiry. They phoned up again and told me they had done it, roughly a brief description of what/what had happened over the phone, and I was told by PC Hood where Mr. Hamilton was at this time.

Were you alerted to the fact that Strathclyde Police made arrangements for parents to come if they wanted to take their children home? - I didn't know that until later on. I was doing split shifts and I had left after a while quite early in the evening as I was coming back out at night.

But around that time, did you learn that? - Yes.

And you learned about the children being taken from a cinema? - The next day they arranged to go, they said they were going out to the island, and never told us. It was the boatman that contacted us, but Hamilton had left with the boys.

Now, /

2.20 p.m.

Now, we have heard evidence of a complaint against Constables Duncan and Gunn which arose out of this incident. Were you roped into that complaint? - Yes.

To what extent? - I believe we had a committee meeting of the Centre Council just after it, shortly after that, and Hamilton came up to me and said "You are at Balfron now I understand", and I said "That is right". He said "You will know about my complaint". I said "What complaint?" and he said "P.C. Gunn put in a bad report about me. What is in the report?" and I said "It is sub judice. I can't discuss it". Thereafter he kept phoning my house virtually daily.

What was his purpose in so doing? - He wanted to know what the contents of the statements were that were made by P.C.s Gunn and Duncan so he could sue the police for breaking up his camp. He said he had lost money -- he said he had lost his camp, it had cost him money, because he had to give money back to the boys.

Did he write to you at all? - Numerous letters.

About what? - About the camps, complaints. Every letter he sent to various persons, I got a copy of it.

There is no sign you were formally complained about, but was your understanding that he did complain about you? - He did complain about me.

What did he complain about you in relation to? - He went into Headquarters. He phoned one day shortly after asking if he could come and speak to me again. I said "I have nothing to speak to you about. I can't discuss it. It is sub judice". He said "I will need to speak to you about something else". This was a Saturday, and I said "If you call about 1 o'clock I should be free, saving anything unforeseen happening". Now, unfortunately a couple of incidents arose at Dunblane at that time, and I had to attend to them, and I didn't get back till 4 in the afternoon. He thought I was evading him, and he went in and complained/complained about me.

But there was never any formal police procedure about you? - No.

When he contacted you did he ever try to justify himself? - Yes, he tried to say he was running good youth clubs, he was a responsible person.

Did he ever show you documents to try and justify himself? - Yes, he heard that some of the children were alleging there was a lack of food. On one occasion he was in my house -- I had been out to call at Dunblane for mail, and I just phoned my wife and said I would be back in five or ten minutes. In the interim he arrived in my house to speak to me. My wife told him to come in. When I arrived home he was in the house. I wasn't very pleased about that. He tried to discuss it, and I told him I was not discussing it. He went on about the food. He produced a bill he had got from one of the supermarkets "See the good I bought for the kids. That shows you how much I paid". I said "That doesn't prove anything". I looked at it, and near the bottom was an item for two or three cans of beer. I said "Were you buying drink for the kids as well?" and he just snatched it back from me and put it in his pocket.

There were suggestions to this Inquiry that he was a tee-totaller? - I have never known him to have a drink; but it was certainly on the itemised bill.

Did it get to the point where he was making complaints about the police persecuting him and associating you with these complaints? - Yes, just about simply rumours. Every year he would put round letters about his youth club in Dunblane saying he was also a photographer, and he had been involved with the police at Loch Lomond at his camps.

Did he ever show you photographs? - He did some, and he also invited me to the camps, "I will show you videos", which I also understand he went into headquarters and spoke about as well.

What about the photographs he showed you?/

you? - It was just photographs of a camp in Loch Lomond.

Now, did there come a stage when the arrangements for letting the premises were changed? - Yes.

When was that? - Just about three years ago now.

What was changed? - There was a new management in the Council's Youth and Community policy, and the female that took over though it was up to the committee to agree the lets, not the full-time officer.

That was Jackie Cowan? - Yes.

She followed Mr. Gardiner? - No, Mr. Sutherland came after Mr. Gardiner.

She had his job? - Yes.

She decided the Council should negotiate the lets? - Yes.

Hamilton started having camps at the high school? - That is correct.

Do you know when he started that? - I think that was the year after he did his Loch Lomond one. They were stopped. I believe they would not allow him back on the island. He applied for a camp and was given it.

How many camps do you reckon he had in Dunblane High School? Over how many years? - I think three or four.

Did you go to any of them? - Yes.

How many? - On two of the years I was up and I attended. He asked me to attend to make sure everything was okay, to pop in any time, which I did, in and out of uniform. I would just walk in initially when I was out walking as well.

Do you know what years you visited his camps, what two years? - Say about three years ago and the year before.

Did/

Did you go more than once in each year? - Yes.

Was there anything wrong about what was he was doing on these occasions? - No, I couldn't see anything wrong.

What about the dress of the kids? - When they were in the gym -- I also dropped in when he was running his youth club on a Thursday night. He also asked me to go to this. In the gym they were all just dressed in shorts and trainers, and they were running about doing keep-fit, exercising, running, and there was nothing I could see that was wrong other than that all the boys were always stripped to the waist. His idea, however, was that they were always sweaty, and it was to stop them getting dirty.

Were you concerned about the fact they had nothing on on top? - No, because there was a parent -- because I stayed in Dunblane they all knew who I was, the locals and the parents, and one or two spoke to me about it, and one of the parents of one of the boys went along quite regularly to it just to make sure everything was okay, because his son wanted to go, and he wanted to make sure there was going to be nothing untoward happening.

Did the amount of interest in these clubs and camps from Dunblane residents decline? - Yes, the number of pupils dropped until at the end just before I finished with it he was bussing kids in from Balfron.

Now, there was a dispute we have heard about in relation to the let he got for one of the camps being interrupted in part by a let to another group. Can you tell us something about that? - To the Quakers' Church group?

Yes? - Yes.

Could you tell us something about that? - We had agreed we would be the ones responsible for the lets. Since the Loch Lomond incident he turned up at nearly every meeting we had. Prior to that he was very seldom there. It was discussed, and one of the Quakers, who was also a committee member, said "Could we have a let for the Sunday School?/"

School? We finish by half past 12", and he objected, and I said "I thought you only used the kitchen down at the other end of the school, not in the community wing?", and he committee agreed they could get it on a Sunday up till half past 12, this community wing, where there is a small kitchen with one cooker. I don't think he was present at that meeting -- or was he? I can't recall now.

Yes? - Anyway, I got a telephone call shortly after it from him objecting to us cutting his hours on a Sunday because of this church group. He said every year which passed the church group stopped taking their services on a Sunday, and I said I wasn't aware of that at all. I said "Put it in writing, and we will discuss it". He went to his councillor and the next thing I was told it was granted.

He went to more than his councillor, did he not? - Apparently he always went through this councillor, then it went through the Education Committee.

Who was the councillor? - Ball.

Was that issue ever resolved? - Yes, it was taken off our hands. We understand the let was granted the previous year, which Miss Jackie Cowan had not told us about.

We may see in the correspondence that he had been asked to apply yet again shortly before the camp began? - We did not know he had applied.

So there were two separate lets at different specified times? - Yes.

Now, was that the only major issue of complaint he had at the Council? - He always thought we were against him, trying to cut his hours. I think the previous year on a Thursday evening one of the adult badminton groups approached us and said "He is finishing early on a Thursday night. Is there any chance of us getting half an hour of his time so we can run a junior badminton club?". We spoke to the janitor of the school, who said he was leaving early. In fact I went up on one occasion, and he had gone about half an hour prior to his let terminating. It was therefore discussed/discussed at the next meeting.

Yes? - Before we had the next meeting I got in touch with Jackie Cowan. I said "You better check with the Council's Legal Department, because you know what Hamilton is like and we will get letters of complaint about this". He always told us about him winning his case with the Ombudsman against the Region.

So that is another problem for him relating to the time he was being allocated in the High School? - Yes.

Any other complaints? - The only other thing was, he was accountable to no one. He charged so much a night. Other people that were running youth clubs, like judo and dancing, they had to pay for their lets. Even the churches paid for lets, but Hamilton got his free.

Was this because it was a youth club? - It was a private club. The youth clubs on a Monday night and a Tuesday night had to produce books and accounts to the Council: they got to look at the books and everything else. Hamilton was accountable to no one.

Yes? - Initially he was charging 50p per night per boy. When he started his youth club he was getting 60 or 70 boys there, and 60 or 70 at 50p is a lot of money.

Were you aware of a policy of discouraging his youth premises if alternative uses could be found? - No. We were always told it had to be for youth, that youth had to have the priority. Other groups were told -- as the years went on we got busier. Now, between 7 and 10 is the busiest time for these community halls to be used, and we had to turn down other groups.

Did your Council consult the Legal Department at all? - Only when we stopped his half hour meeting, or reduced it by half an hour. We contacted him regarding that. That was done through the full-time youth leader.

So throughout the time you were associated with the Council was the policy or attitude that if Hamilton/

Hamilton applied and the premises were available he would get them? - Yes.

Did you ever hear any positive information about him on which you as a police officer might have acted to try to stop his activities? - No.

You went on to the Council as a police representative. Did you remain throughout your period as a police representative? - No. At the very end after all the complaints and letters going back and forwards from Hamilton to the Chief Constable, 18 months or two years ago I was told to say I was not a police officer.

Do you know why that was? - No, I never got a satisfactory answer yet.

I would like you to look at one or two documents. The first is D83/K, which I think we have: do you have that? - Yes.

Can you see that is a letter dated 16th January, 1991 to the then new Chief Constable, William Wilson? - Yes.

Does it mention there at the second page of the first paragraph "In fact, when your officers eventually visited the camp on Wednesday, 20th July, 1998, even their sergeant, Bob Moir, and their Inspector, Mike Mill, did not know that they were visiting our camp or their whereabouts"? - Yes.

Can you confirm the impression from your evidence that you sent Gunn and Duncan to the camp? - Yes, we said it was on this island in Loch Lomond.

But you sent them? - Yes. The phone call came in. It was the girl that took it. I spoke to them, and they left to go.

You will see in the last paragraph he described what happened as "An arbitrary condemnation of our 1988 summer camp by your officers, without knowing or checking the facts", and he says ".....it was a deliberate and malicious attempt to cause maximum disruption and damage to our group, which it did"? - Yes.

Now, /

Now, that doesn't sound as though that is what you had in mind? - No. I explained to them just to go and see it "Treat it as if your own child was there" to P.C. Gunn. That is the only way I believe you can do it, because everyone has different standards.

I would be grateful if you would look at the Minutes of the Council, DDH29, the Minutes of the 12th May, 1994: have you got them? - Yes.

You appear as one of the persons attending Dunblane Centre Council Annual General Meeting. Do you see that? - Yes.

Look to item 5, the name of the Council changed at that meeting to Dunblane High School Wing Council? - Yes.

Do they still seem to be responsible for Braeport Centre? - No. What happened here is that -- we have a lack of facilities in Dunblane. We have been pushing for a new community centre through the Region for a number of years, and we had an open meeting in the Victoria Halls in Dunblane, and it was agreed that a Steering Committee would be set up to look at the possibilities of sites, costs and that type of thing, which was done. When this was done, Jackie Cowan and her superiors decided themselves that we would have to split the Council, with the Dunblane Centre Council looking after the Braeport and the Dunblane High School Wing Council being responsible for the Community Education Wing at the high school, which was two different identities. This new Steering Group which was set up to look after the new community centre took over the running of the Braeport.

But/

2.40 p.m.

But this meeting would be after you had already decided that it was the Council who were responsible for dealing with lets, is that correct? - It was just about this time it then became the responsibility of the Council to deal with lets.

Then if you look at DFU27 which is a series of four letters all dated 30th May. You will see the first of these is to Michael Forsyth? - Yes.

And the Heading is "1994 Summer Camp 10th-24th July 1994", is that right? - Yes.

And the letter is signed Thomas Hamilton? - Yes.

And this is about this problem you have just mentioned about the let for that camp, is that correct? - Yes.

Do you see in the second paragraph he says "It comes as no surprise to me that a member of Central Scotland Police has been involved in this. Central Scotland Police have taken every arbitrary opportunity to disrupt our camps and Clubs all, in my view, as part of an ongoing conspiracy". Is that what he says? - Yes.

Now, were you in any way involved in trying to disrupt his camp when that decision was taken? - No.

And in the next paragraph he says "I have spoken to the police representative who signed the restriction to ask why such a last minute decision was taken". Now, that would be a reference to him speaking to you? - Yes, this was raised. As I said, Jackie Cowan had agreed that we would now be responsible for the lets and this let came in and we changed it. Well, the Church group would have it on a Sunday morning up to 12.30.

But all I want to confirm is this is you he is referring to?
- Yes.

And he did speak to you about it, is that right? - Yes.

And/

And you tried to explain it to him? - Yes.

And he didn't accept the explanation basically? - Yes, that is correct.

Can you confirm he also at the same time wrote to Mrs. Cowan setting out his case? - Yes.

And that he also wrote to the Commissioner for Local Administration in Scotland, affectionately known as the Ombudsman? - Yes.

And that he also wrote to the Chief Executive of Central Regional Council? - Yes.

To state his case to each of these people? - Yes.

All on the 30th May, is that right?
- Yes.

Now, would you look please at D196K which is a memo. It may be there separately. It is dated the 1st June 1994 from the Depute Chief Constable to Inspector Barker. It is also DCD229. Now, you will see that is a short memo from the Depute Chief Constable to Inspector Barker at Dunblane dated 1st June. Do you see that? - Yes.

And we can take it that some of the last correspondence I have just referred to had reached the Depute Chief Constable's hands and he is asking "Can you assure me that Bob Moir is involved in Dunblane High School as a private citizen and not as a police officer" and does that date the time at which you have a change in status? - Yes.

And if you look at D197, the next item, do we see Inspector Barker's reply? - Yes.

Now, if you look at the second page of that, does it say "The allegations made and aspersions cast by Hamilton regarding a police conspiracy in respect of this matter appears to be totally without foundation in that Sergeant Moir was acting in a completely voluntary capacity"? - That is wrong. I told him. I said I was asked to go along as a police representative a number of years previous and when I moved away from Dunblane to/

to other stations I phoned the various different inspectors who took over in Dunblane and I explained to them who I was and what I did and I said "Do you want to send someone else or do you wish me to carry on?" and they just said "Carry on yourself and keep on doing it". When I saw this I said "You are just going to get another letter back from Hamilton". When I saw that.

Well, you don't need a crystal ball for that one. If you look at D200K you will see that Inspector Barker there confirms that you had undertaken to make it clear in the future that you were there as a private citizen? - That is correct.

And you did undertake to do that, is that right? - Yes.

Now, can you look please at a letter which I think has been copied for everyone which is DDH308. It is dated 10th June 1994 and is from Central Scotland Police to Councillor Ball. It's the last sentence in the second paragraph of that letter "My Sergeant Moir, who is involved in a wide range of community work in the area, has been the Chairman of this body for more than 10 years, but purely as private citizen, not in his capacity as a police officer"? - That is right.

That is not your understanding? - No.

And that is signed by Mr. McMurdo, is that right? - Yes. I got copies of these letters sent as well. Every letter that Hamilton received or sent, he sent me copies and whenever I saw this I explained it to the Inspector. I said "That's wrong".

If you look now at the letter of the 16th June from Mr. Hamilton to Councillor Ball which is DFU29. Do you see in the second paragraph there that Hamilton says to Councillor Ball "I have to say that contrary to their letter....." -- that is the police letter we have just looked at -- "..... Sergeant Moir is and has always been clearly defined in Minutes etc. over some 10 years or more as being the police representative and not 'purely as a private citizen, not in his capacity as a police officer'"? - That is correct.

So/

So you and Hamilton are at one on that, is that right?

- Yes.

I think in the last paragraph of that letter he thanks Councillor Ball for his interest in this further unfortunate matter, is that right? Does he say "I thank you most sincerely for your interest in this further unfortunate matter and your kind help in other related matters"? - Yes, that is right. "I thank you most sincerely".

"I thank you most sincerely for your interest in this further unfortunate matter and your kind help in other related matters"? - Yes.

Go back to the front page of that letter and tell me what the heading is at the very top? - "Boys' Sports Club Group Committee".

And Thomas W. Hamilton, Group Chairman? - That is right. Well, he said he was.

That is what it says? - Yes.

Now, go to the second sentence in the last paragraph and read it please? - "Both the Committee and myself are, as always, impressed with your competence, honesty, integrity, sense of fair play and dedication to all of your constituents. In my own findings over many years of practical experience, these qualities are unfortunately not found among officers of Central Scotland Police -- in fact, quite the opposite!".

But he is writing there on behalf of "The Committee and myself"? - Yes, that is correct.

Now, attached to that there are copies of Minutes in 1992 where you are designed as Chairman/Police or Police/Chairman? - Yes, that is the police representative chairman but I also could have signed, with me running the Youth Club at the time, I was a representative from the Youth Club because as I said earlier, I was a representative of the different groups which made up the Committee of the Centre Council.

I think it would be fair to say, though, that this sort of petty problem was meat and drink to/

to Mr. Hamilton? - Yes.

And it indeed gets on to the agenda of the Council and if you look at DDH311, which is a Minute of a Council Meeting on the 28th June 1994, and look at Item 6. Do we see there that the problem over the let was raised at the meeting, is that right? - Yes.

Now, was it a question of resolving responsibility for the lets or was it a complaint by Hamilton that brought it on to the agenda? - Not only Hamilton raised it. It was only raised with others because the School Boards then took over and we were left with the problem of conflict. Were the School Boards letting out the rooms and were they responsible as they were responsible for the school and also were we then responsible. It was to avoid any clashes. You know, avoid double bookings etc.

Now, can you look please at letter DFU30 which is a letter of the 5th June from Hamilton to Councillor Ball and if you look at the second paragraph do we see there that the issue is not going to go away where he says "Robert Moir's role on the Centre Council has suddenly switched from Police Representative to Senior Youth Club Representative and not as 'purely a private citizen'. Indeed under the Chairmanship of Robert Moir this incompetent action is one of a series of decisions which has undermined my group on an arbitrary basis"? - Yes, that was when the initial letter went in. I said that I have been representative as far as I have been aware when I first went along to these Centre Council meetings and it was only when I was told I had to stop I said "Well, I am also representative for the Youth Group".

Now, we could spend many enjoyable moments going through the rest of the correspondence and Minutes about this but to no particular effect. Can you tell me whether you got to the stage ever of saying as a Council "Hamilton is not getting our premises"? - No, we never ever said that.

Did you ever get to the stage of being so concerned even about him that you debated whether or not he should get the premises? - No.

Was/

Was your Council privy to information that was causing it at any stage concern about his having the premises? Concern as a Council? - No.

Well, did you know anything else about Thomas Hamilton that you think might be of assistance to the Inquiry? - The only thing, as I said earlier, was that he was accountable to no one and I think with Youth Clubs, whoever is doing it should be accountable to someone.

You have been identified as a person that a number of people are concerned should give evidence to the Inquiry because they are worried that perhaps we are not getting all the information we should be getting so I invite you to tell me anything you know that you think the Inquiry ought to know about Hamilton? - Nothing other than this.

No cross-examination.

KATHERINE MARY ANDERSON (59), Sworn:

EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMY: I think you stay in Dunblane? - I do.

And we have already heard evidence from your husband who is Ewan Anderson? - That is right.

When did you first know Thomas Hamilton? - Well, I can't really remember the exact dates but I think it was in 1982.

How did you get to know him? - Through his association with my husband.

What was his connection with your husband? - It was the rifle shooting.

And was your husband a member of the Dunblane Rifle Club? - Yes. Well, he was. He isn't now.

He was at the time? - Yes.

Did/

Did Hamilton become a visitor to your home? - Yes.

Was he a frequent visitor? - Not to begin with. It was usually once a week.

And was that connected with going to the rifle Club? - I couldn't really tell you if it was or not. I don't think it was, no.

In your statement you indicated that he started coming to the house on Friday nights before and after going to the rifle range. Is that not right? - I thought it was Thursday nights. I don't think it was a Friday. My husband doesn't shoot on a Friday.

But was it in connection with going to the rifle Club that he came to the house? - I don't think so.

Well, can you remember in what connection it was? - Well, I think he started coming because of the connection with the rifle Club but it was just a friendly call to begin with.

Did you actually on any occasion visit a boat he had at Loch Lomond? - Once I think. Twice maybe.

So how friendly were you around that time? - Well, as I say, I think he called about once a week.

Did he ask you and your husband to help him in connection with this Boys' Club? - He asked us if.....he was thinking of forming a Committee and he asked us if we would go on the Committee.

Did he tell you why he was forming a Committee? - I don't think so. I think he just said that he was starting up the Boys' Club again and he was forming a Committee.

Did you have family at that stage? - Yes.

Boys or girls? - Girls.

What were their ages at that time? -

In/

In 1982 one of them would be 11 and the other one nine.

Now, that is when you first got to know him. Could it have been a bit later than that that the question of helping out with his Club arose? - Yes, much later than that.

Could that have been in 1984? - Well, I can't remember if it was 1984 or 1985 but it was when he got the let renewed to start up the Boys' Club again, Dunblane Boys' Club. I think it was probably 1985 but I'm not sure of the date.

Now, did you agree to help him? - Well, he said that he was trying to form a Committee and could we go to a meeting about forming a Committee which we went to.

Where was that meeting? - In his house.

Do/

3 p.m.

Do you remember who else was at the meeting? -
Yes. Do you want names?

Yes, please? - There was Mr. Williams. At the time I gave my statement I thought he was at the meeting, but when I discussed it with my husband I thought Mr. and Mrs. Williams were there, but it was only Mr. Williams, because I couldn't remember; it was so long ago.

Is that Mr. James Williams? - Yes.

Had you met him at that time? - No, I hadn't met him before that.

Who else was there? - Mrs. McFarlane, my husband, myself, and there was another lady there who at the moment I can't remember her name, and Mr. Hamilton was there. I think that was all, but I am not very sure.

What was decided? - It was decided that these people there would form the Committee.

Did you have a particular position on the Committee?
- Yes, I agreed to be Secretary.

What was the Committee called? - The Committee?

Or the club? - It was just the Committee.

What was the club called? - The Dunblane Boys'
Club.

Was there a discussion about the activities of the club? - I presume so. I can't remember.

Was there a discussion about why this Committee was being formed? - It was because a new club, the Dunblane Boys' Club, was starting up.

Were you aware at that stage of some difficulty Mr. Hamilton had encountered about running his club at Dunblane High School? - Yes.

Were/

Were you aware the Committee had something to do with trying to resolve that difficulty? - I think we were made aware at that meeting that he was getting the let renewed from the Council.

So you knew he had lost it? - Yes.

Did you know you were on the Committee to give some sort of either control or respectability to his club? - You mean at that time?

Yes? - No, not at that meeting. We were just asked to form a Committee, which we agreed to.

He didn't tell you he needed a Committee for the Council to agree to reinstate his let? - No.

Did you have to attend any official meeting as a result of being on this Committee? - Yes, we were told that night we agreed to form a Committee that the Council would like to meet the Committee, which we did. We went to the Council Chambers, and we went to that meeting, those people I have already mentioned.

What happened there? - I can't remember everything that happened, but I remember the Council saying they were putting a certain onus on the Committee to see it was run properly.

So by this time you knew there were particular reasons why he needed a Committee? - Well, I would think any club would have a Committee.

But here you have a club which gets a Committee, and the first thing it has to do is go and meet the Council? - I thought that was because of the rumours that had gone before.

What were the rumours about? - As far as I was aware, the boys' club he had had before, which was called the Rover Club, I understand the Scout movement had objected to the name because of the Rover Scouts, and that club had been disbanded. I had heard a couple of rumours by then.

I don't want you to give me any names of boys, but what were the rumours? - I heard two rumours; that on one occasion two boys had been left/left on the island with just a tin of mince to eat, and the other one was that one boy had been left with either a tin of mince or a tin of beans.

Had you heard any stories about kids being homesick? - One of the boys I mentioned -- I knew the boy and his parents, and after I heard that rumour about the boys being left on the island I heard from the boy's mother that the boy -- this was a different occasion -- the boy had been at his aunt's for a holiday, and the mother had to go and bring him back after two days because he was homesick.

Yes? - At the time I was asked to go on the Committee I asked Mr. Hamilton about that incident, and he said the boy was homesick, but he said if boys are homesick they are not going to tell their parents, they are going to tell a different story. That tied in with what I had heard from the mother of the boy, and I thought it must have been just rumours.

Following the meeting with the Council did you take any active part as a Committee member in the physical running of the club? - No.

Did you do anything as secretary? - I did correspondence.

Was there much of that? - I would say there was quite a bit. There were letters. I was only involved at the one summer camp, and there were letters about that. There were letters I think about obtaining grants for equipment, but I really can't remember. It was just general correspondence.

We have had a lot of evidence about his writing to all and sundry on numerous occasions. Was that his practice in the time you were secretary? - No.

So the letters you are describing sounded as though they had some purpose? - Yes. They were to do with the running of the club.

They were not letters of complaint, for example, or letters of contention with other bodies and complaining about other people? - I don't quite follow you. You mean that the club was complaining?

Yes?/

Yes? - No, not that I recall.

After you were on the Committee did Mr. Hamilton continue to visit your home? - Yes.

Did you visit his home on any occasion? - Not socially. I don't think there were regular Committee meetings. I think there was one other Committee meeting in his house. We did not visit his house socially, no.

Did you meet his mother, at that time known as his sister? - Yes, at the first meeting to form the Committee.

Was she on the Committee? - No.

Did you meet his father, whom we now know is his grandfather? - No, I met who I thought was his sister, although it was his mother, and I met who I thought was his mother, who has turned out to be his grandmother.

But neither was on the Committee? - No.

How long did you remain secretary? - I can't remember whether it was 1984 or 1985, but it was in the autumn of that year. If it was 1984 it was from the autumn of 1984 to the spring of 1985; if it was 1985 it was the autumn of 1985 into the spring of 1987.

If I say to you the meeting with the Council was in the autumn of 1985.....? - Well, it was from the autumn of 1985 until the spring of 1987 I was on the Committee.

What led to you resigning from the Committee? - I changed my job. I had only been working a few hours a day, and when I changed my job I felt I did not have the time. It was not so much the quantity of the work, it was the inconvenience of it. Mr. Hamilton would just come up to the house just after tea time saying he wanted letters done, and he would wait and take them with him to post or to photocopy.

Did your husband remain on the Committee after you resigned? - Yes.

For/

For much longer? - I couldn't tell you. Less than a year, I think.

Throughout the period up until your resignation was your husband still going shooting with Hamilton from time to time? - They did not actually go shooting together on a regular basis. I think my husband maybe went with Mr. Hamilton twice, but not at the Dunblane Club. It was at a range that Mr. Hamilton used: I don't know if it was Dechmont.

Did Hamilton ever bring any weapons to your home? - Yes.

On more than one occasion? - I remember just one occasion.

What did he bring? - I don't know. I think it was two firearms, but I don't know what kind they were. I am not into firearms.

Do you remember if any of them was a rifle? - I think one was a black thing about that. I remember at the time thinking it was a terrible looking thing, a terrible looking piece of equipment.

You were indicating 18 inches to two feet? - Yes.

Did he say anything about that particular weapon? - No.

In your statement you have referred to him coming to the house and having a gun in a case and taking it out to show you and your husband? - Yes.

And saying it cost over £1,000, and he was told he was only getting £100 compensation back when it was handed in, because of Hungerford? - I do know he told us at the time of Hungerford that he had -- was it a Kalashnikov?

£1,000.

After you and your husband were off the Committee did Hamilton continue to visit you? - Yes.

Until when? - I think it must have been during 1989. I think it must have been before the summer of 1989.

What brought matters to an end? - I didn't realise this at the time; we only discovered this after this happened. We wondered why he had stopped coming, and my son-in-law told me one night when we were out and he was in the house Hamilton called, and my son-in-law told him not to come back, that he was making a nuisance of himself.

And he didn't? - He didn't re-appear after that.

Was he a nuisance about that time? - He was. When he started coming at first I didn't see him as much as my husband, because it was always on a Thursday night, and I was always out when he came. But he started coming two, three, sometimes four nights a week latterly.

Did he continue to use your name as a Committee member after you had resigned? - I didn't know if he did.

Did it come to your attention that he still had your name on a leaflet? - That was my husband's name. I found out at the time of this that he had both my husband and myself down as members of a previous club, which we had never anything to do with.

Now, prior to the formation of the Committee you have been telling us about he had his dispute with the Council over the letting of the premises at the High School, and in connection with that there was a petition presented to the Council to try to keep the lets going. Did you have any part to play in that petition? - I don't remember a petition.

We have had evidence in the Inquiry that you were actually round doors collecting signatures for/

for a petition? - That I was?

Yes. You went to George Robertson's door? - I don't remember that.

You stay quite near him? - Yes. I had been round with a petition round Dunblane to do with the rates, but I don't know when it was. That was the only time I remember going round. I also collect for Christian Aid in Dunblane. I don't remember going round with a petition.

When was the petition about rates? - I don't know.

Was the Council Labour or Tory? - I don't know.

I am just trying to work out whether you would go to George Robertson's door? - I had an area to do. George Robertson lives just up the hill from us. If there was someone collecting or going round that would include the area.

If he was within the area.....? - Yes. I went to people's doors with a petition about the rates, and they said they wouldn't sign it as they were employed by the Council. I was employed by the Council as well.

If you look at D50/H(v) -- have you got that? - Yes.

You will see that is a letter headed "Dunblane Rover Group"? - Yes.

And under that "J. Williams, representative of parents"? - Yes.

And you have told us there was a J. Williams at your meetings? - Yes.

His address is 3 Murdoch Terrace, Dunblane? - Yes.

This is dated 2nd November, 1983, addressed to the Director of Administration and Legal Services of the Council? - Yes.

It reads "We as parents of the boys attending/attending the Dunblane Rover Group wish to appeal against the decision taken by the Education Authorities (following a sub-committee recommendation), to terminate the lease of the Dunblane High School"? - Yes.

It talks about Mr. Hamilton, the group leader, and all the other voluntary helpers having given a great deal of their time and resources to ensure that members find a healthy outlet to their boundless energy by channelling it into a constructive form? - Yes.

And then if you go down to the bottom of that paragraph it says "We believe that Mr. Hamilton is the victim of malicious back-stabbing by a person or persons unknown possibly calculated to cause disharmony"; is that right? - Yes.

Then he says "We are all proud to have Mr. Thomas Hamilton in charge of our boys. He is a man gifted with excellent qualities of leadership, integrity and absolute devotion to his lads. Above all, he cares"? - Yes.

Then it has "Yours faithfully, the parents (as listed over)"? - Yes.

Then there is three pages of signatures? - Yes.

I can tell you there are 70 signatures there. Now, did you gather these signatures? - Not that I remember.

It is headed "Dunblane Rover Group"? - I had nothing to do with that.

These forms say "Management Committee, Dunblane Rover Group". Do you see that? - Yes. I was never on the Committee. I had nothing to do with the Dunblane Rover Group, although when this Inquiry was coming up I was shown a letter that had been sent to the Council where my husband's name and my own name were on as being members of the Committee, but I was not there. I was not involved with the Committee until 1985 when the Dunblane Boys' Club started up. That was when I became involved. I had nothing to do with the Rover Group, and I can't see my signature on this petition, so I would/would imagine if I had been round collecting signatures I would also have signed the petition.

Well, you were not the parent of a child who would be attending the group, so it may not have been appropriate for you to sign it, the way it is worded? - No.

I may have given you wrong information about the time of the formation of the Committee. Perhaps you can clarify this for me. If you go to D53 in that volume, I think you can see this is a letter of 24th February, 1984 to Mr. Buchanan, the Director of Administration and Legal Services, headed "Dunblane Boys' Club"? - Yes.

It says "We.....are pleased to supply the information that you request" in the first sentence? - Yes.

And the Management Committee is set out there, including your own name as secretary? - Yes.

And your husband is there, and some of the other names you have mentioned are there? - Yes.

If you go to the end of that letter you will see that you appear to have signed it? - Yes.

Do you remember signing it? - I don't really remember the letter, but I presume yes. No, I don't think so.

Is it your signature? - It looks like my signature, but I certainly did not type it.

Did you sign it? - Well, it looks like my signature.

I take it you would not sign a blank? - No.

If/

3.20 p.m.

If you go to the second page and in the middle you will see a heading "Difference between Dunblane Rover Group and Dunblane Boys' Club" and it says "1. The Committee is agreed to disband as Dunblane Rover Group; 2. The Committee is agreed to form as Dunblane Boys' Club; 3. The Committee is agreed to a new constitution as enclosed", all suggesting that this is a replacement of the Rovers Group, to give it a different identity. Were you not party to this letter? - I don't recollect it.

Can I ask you then to look at another item which I think may have been copied. It is a letter of the 31st of October 1983. It is also in.....? - Sorry, I was still looking at this other letter. Which one are you on?

Another one will be given to you and it is also in D21/J(i) and it has got a number 28. There is a whole series of these letters but one of them has the number 28. It will be put in front of you. Now, you will see that that is a letter of the 31st of October 1983 to Mr. Buchanan again and the heading is "Dunblane Rover Group -- let of Dunblane High School" and you have signed it? - I am just reading the letter.

Well, before you do that, can you tell me if that is your signature? - Well, it looks like my signature.

All right. Now, yes, please read the letter? - No, I didn't sign that. It looks like my signature but I didn't sign it because it says in it "Firstly, as an interested member of the Management Committee of the Dunblane Rover Group" and I wasn't a member of the Dunblane Rover Group. I wasn't associated with it at all.

It also says in the second paragraph "All activities are well supervised, as I myself have been present on various occasions at meetings and outings". Had you been present at any? - I was at one. I don't know if it was with the Dunblane Boys' Club or if it was when he was with the Rover Group but we were invited. I think it was maybe when he had the Rover Group. He asked us if we would like to go one Sunday on a swimming outing to/

to the Commonwealth pool but that was not in an official capacity. He was taking the boys and asked if we would like to go and take our two daughters. It wasn't official.

The letter in the second paragraph says "I have accompanied the boys from the group on outings to places of public interest when the behaviour of the boys has made me proud to be associated with the group. This, nowadays, cannot always be said of large groups of children out in public"? - Yes. Well, I was at the Commonwealth pool on one trip with the boys.

It then goes on to say "As a parent of two daughters, my children naturally are not members of the Dunblane Rovers but they have had the pleasure of being invited on several occasions to sail with Mr. Hamilton, my husband and myself"? - Well, that is true. We did go sailing with him.

"The care and safety shown to my family, especially the two children, in these instances, was of the very highest standard", is that right? - Well, yes, it says that.

The next section says "Secondly-I come into contact daily with many of the boys from the group in the course of my duties as School Helper at Dunblane Primary School, and I know how much they enjoy the groups activities"? - Yes, well, I have lost you now.

If you look at the word "Secondly"? - Yes.

And then the next bit says.....? - Well, I was a School Helper at Dunblane.

And did you come in daily contact with many of the boys from the club? - Well, I wouldn't have known the boys with the Rover Group because I wasn't associated with the Rover Group.

You might have known them if you had been to the Commonwealth pool with them? - On one occasion.

You would probably know the boys if you saw them at school and then at the pool. Would you not/not recognise them? - If you ask me now to name the boys who were in the Dunblane Group that I was associated with I could probably only name two at the moment.

Is it not possible even that you wrote this letter? - Not when it says "Firstly as an interested member of the Management Committee of the Dunblane Rover Group" because I was never involved with the Dunblane Rover Group.

Are the rest of the contents largely accurate? - Well, I wouldn't know about "all activities are well supervised" because I was never there. I was never even at a meeting of the Dunblane Boys' Club although I was the secretary. We went sailing twice with Mr. Hamilton.

If you go forward now please to D78/J(i) you see there this is an excerpt from a Minute of a meeting of the Further Education and General Purposes Sub-Committee of the Education Committee. Have you got it? - Yes.

Held on the 23rd of September 1985 and if you could go over two pages.....? - Excuse me, but was this the meeting held in the Council Chambers?

Well, this Minute relates to a meeting which you were not at but you were at the earlier meeting which is referred to there as a special sub-committee and if you go over two pages you will see the Minute of the sub-committee meeting which was actually held on the 4th of September? - 1985?

Yes? - Yes, that is when I became involved.

And you will see your name near the top of that page? - Yes.

As one of the people coming to the meeting? - Yes.

And the others there were Mr. Hamilton, Mrs. McFarlane, your husband, Mr. Williams and a solicitor. Do you remember that? - I don't remember the solicitor. Probably because I didn't know the man.

Well,/

Well, it is a woman? - Oh, sorry. I remember Mr. Hamilton, Mrs. McFarlane and it has got Mr. K. Anderson. It should be Mr. E. Anderson. Mr. Williams.

Were these people, apart from the solicitor, you do remember being at the meeting? - Yes.

Now, we know that there was correspondence about the possibility of such a meeting for quite a long time and we have seen a letter dated the 24th of February 1984, you saw it earlier, in which you are listed as a member of the Committee? - That was of the Rovers?

No, the new group? - Sorry.

If you go back to D53 in H(v). You have seen that already but just to remind yourself, this is a letter your signature appears on and that one is dated February 1984 so it is quite difficult I suppose to date exactly when you first got involved in this Committee? - I got involved in the Committee when he got to renew the let and the name was then the Dunblane Boys' Club.

But can we date it to the letter which is the same idea or the meeting with the Council which is a year and a half later? - Well, it was the meeting of the Council because we had a meeting at Mr. Hamilton's house to ask the people that were present if they would form a Committee and then I think it was that same week or maybe the week after that we had a meeting in the Council Chambers.

Well, if the date on the letter is accurate then the presence of your signature on it is a bit of a mystery? - Exactly. I mean, I don't really know it is my signature. It looks like it.

I suppose you might say Hamilton writes in a similar way to you on the face of the signatures. Does the signature look like yours at all? - Well, if you look at the signature on my cheque card, it is not my signature that is on that letter. If you want to look at that?

letter. It is not my signature I would say.

It might be as well if you look in that connection also at the other letter, the one which was in D21/J(i) which had the 28 at the top of it. The other place that we had your signature, apparent signature, the letter of the 31st of October? - Well, as I say, it looks like mine.

Does that look like your signature? - Similar but if you look at it with the cheque card, it is not.

Well, does it look different from the cheque card signature? - Yes.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. JONES: Can I try and be clear about the sequence of events. You knew Thomas Hamilton before the let of Dunblane High School was stopped by the Council? - Well, I wasn't aware of that being stopped. As I say, my husband was more involved on that side than I was up to 1985 because when he called, I'm sure it was a Thursday he normally called and I go out every Thursday night and have done for the last 30 years so I would only see him for a few minutes and when I came back I would say to my husband "Was Tommy up tonight?" and he would say yes and I would maybe say "What was he saying?". As I say, I didn't often see him at that time.

I just want to be clear about this. Were you or were you not aware that the Council had stopped Mr. Hamilton's let at Dunblane High School? - I wasn't aware of it.

Were you never aware of it? - No, I thought it was when he went.....I thought he had been asked to disband the Rovers Group because of the name and that when he went to re-name it the Dunblane Boys' Club, that is when the Council had problems with renewing the let.

And you look again please at D78/J(i). That is the Minutes of the meeting that you attended at the Regional Council in September of 1985. Do you have that document? - D78/J(i), yes.

And that is the Minute of the meeting? - Yes.

Now, /

Now, can you turn to the third page, at the top of which you will see X-219? - Yes.

And then you see the words "Confidential-Not for Publication". Do you see that? - Yes.

You are then recorded as being present. Do you see that? - At that meeting?

At that meeting. Is that right? - If that was the meeting.

Well, do you see your name? - Yes.

And your husband's name? His name is amongst those who were there? - Yes.

Just below the names do you see it says "During a wide-ranging discussion with the Representatives of the Club the following specific points were raised by the Sub-Committee:-" and then there are eight points? - Yes.

Now, do you remember while you were there being asked a number of questions? - No, I don't remember it.

But you accept that you were because that was the purpose of the meeting? - Probably, yes.

And do you see the third question was "During the period since the let for Dunblane Rover Group was terminated had the Committee made any attempt to find alternative accommodation in Stirling, Dunblane or any other area?". Do you see that? - Yes.

Now, if this Minute is accurate, you were at least aware in September of 1985 that the let for the Dunblane Rover Group had been terminated? - Well, I understood it to be that the Rover Group had been asked to disband because of the name.

Well, it says here that you were asked about something happening after the group was terminated. All I am asking you is if this Minute is correct then it must mean that you knew at least in September 1985 the let had been terminated? - I am not saying it wasn't. I am just saying I don't remember it. My recollection is that the Rover Group/

Group had been asked to disband because of the name.

Well, I think that is really what I am trying to get at. It may be your recollection now is not perfect. We are talking of events that happened between 11 and 15 years ago? - Well, I don't remember because I don't even remember the exact date. Until the gentleman there said it was 1985, I couldn't remember the date.

But you accept there is a difference between things not having happened and your not remembering whether they happened? - Well, yes. I suppose so.

Now, do you see that the first point that was put to the people who were there was this; looking back at this document, "Of the Committee membership detailed in the letter dated 24th February, 1984, from the Secretary of the club, only three were residents in Dunblane". Do you see you were asked that? - Well, as I say, I don't remember it. You know, when we had the meeting.....

If you just answer me. Do you see that is in the Minute? - Yes, I see that.

Now, we have heard that one of the papers that was available to the Council was the letter that you have been shown, the letter which bears your signature of the 24th of February 1984. Now, can you have in front of you again please D53 of H(v)? - Yes.

Can/

3.40 p.m.

Can you accept, although you may not remember it, this letter of the 24th February, 1984 was in front of the committee when you attended this meeting in September, 1985? - I cannot answer that, because as I say, I don't think that signature on that letter is mine.

Leaving aside your recollection, I am just asking you if you can accept the Minute is aware of a letter dated 24th February from the Secretary of the club? - Yes.

And the only Secretary of the club you have ever known about is you? - Yes.

Could you look at another document, which is in the other bundle in front of you, D.....? - If I can go back to that, Dunblane Boys' Club was not effective until after this meeting, or at the time of this meeting.

I think you have already seen that the letter of the 24th February, 1984 records the change of name from the Dunblane Rover Group to the Dunblane Boys' Club? - I thought it was at this meeting we were at at the Council Chambers.

If you look at page X-220, you see just below halfway down there is a paragraph which does not begin with a Roman numeral? - Yes.

It begins "In closing their remarks..."?
- Yes.

You see it says "In closing their remarks the representatives from the Dunblane Boys' Club referred to the change of name of the club from Dunblane Rover Group. The club representatives felt they would prefer to revert back to their original name and wondered if the Regional Council would find this acceptable". Do you see that? - Yes. Can I just read that?

Yes? - Well, this was the representatives of the Dunblane Rovers Group I presume saying they would prefer the name to be the -- the Dunblane Boys' Club rather -- saying they would prefer the name to revert to the Dunblane Rovers Group, but that didn't mean the representatives/representatives there were representatives of the Rover Group.

I am putting this to you because you said it was at this meeting in September, 1985 that the name was changed from the Rover Group to the Boys' Club? - No, I didn't say that. I said that my understanding was that when the Rover Group was disbanded it was because of the name, and that I became involved with the Committee of Dunblane Boys' Club, which was in 1985.

Now, you told us I think that the signature on the letter of 24th February, 1984 is not yours. Could you say which one this is? D53/H(v)? - Yes. If you look at my credit card it is not.....

I am not interested in your credit card. The question is whether you are saying the signature on the letter of 24th February, 1984 is not yours. Is that what you are saying? - Just let me read the letter. I am not really sure.

It may be yours? - What I cannot understand is why I would be typing that at the time when I was not the Secretary.

I am not asking you that. I am simply asking you about the signature, and I am asking you to say whether or not you think it is yours? - Well, I would say it looks like mine, but I am not sure.

Could you look at another document, D74/J(i)? -
Yes.

This is a letter which bears to come from your organisation, dated 21st August, 1985. Can you see that? - Yes.

And it is handwritten and appears to be signed by your signature, Katherine M. Anderson? - Yes.

Was this written by you? - Yes.

And that is the same style of signature we have seen both on the letter of 31st October, 1983 and the letter of 24th February, 1984? - Similar, yes.

Can/

Can I ask you to look at one further document? If we go to D49/H(v), this is a very faint photocopied letter. Do you see that? - Yes.

Can you turn from that, turn from the second page and go on to the third page which has "7b" at the top right-hand corner. Have you got that? - Yes.

This appears again to have your address in Dunblane in the top right-hand corner? - Yes.

And that appears to have your husband's signature on the bottom, Ewan Anderson? - Yes.

And that bears the date 6th November, 1983? - Yes.

Do you see the text "Dear Sir, As a fair-minded person I feel obliged to write to you to protest about and to condemn the Director of Education's handling of the Dunblane High School let to the Dunblane Rover Group.

"Firstly let me refute the allegations made about Mr. Hamilton's character and his parting company with the Scout Movement"? - Yes.

And then if I can take you on to the fourth paragraph "I had no personal connection with this group until recently, when due to an injury the sports coach could not attend the Thursday meeting. Mr. Hamilton asked for my assistance to run the five-a-side football. I thoroughly enjoyed the experience and was astounded at the manners and good behaviour of the boys"? - Yes.

Do you remember an occasion when your husband helped out with the five-a-side football? - He did with the Dunblane Boys' Club occasionally, but I could not differentiate.

He stated, "My wife, daughters and myself then assisted with an outing to the Commonwealth Pool in Edinburgh, and can honestly say that we were proud to be seen in their company"? - Yes.

And you remember a trip to the Commonwealth Pool? - Yes. As I say, we were not involved in the running of the club. Mr. Hamilton invited/invited us to go one Sunday.

And that was with the Rover Group? - Yes. Not as part of it. It was a social invitation.

It goes on "In fact we have been so impressed that my wife and I have volunteered our services as members of the Management Committee, now acting as Secretary and Treasurer respectively"? - Yes.

And that is what happened, isn't it? - Yes. Not with the Dunblane Rover Group; with the Dunblane Boys' Club.

Is it just that you do not have any recollection of the club being called the Rover Group at that time? - No. I was not involved with the Dunblane Rover Group; I was involved with the Dunblane Boys' Club.

How do you explain this letter? - I don't know. Mr. Hamilton had put down on a letter that we saw that the CID had produced, he had us put down as members of the Management Committee of the Rover Group, and that was not true. What I am saying is, is this letter true? Did my husband sign that? Because we were not members of the Management Committee of the Rover Group; we had nothing to do with the Rover Group. We were not involved with the Rover Group.

If that is right it must follow that the letter which appears to be signed by you on the 31st October, 1983 is just false?
- That is what I am saying.

And the letter which appears to be signed by your husband a week later is just false? - Yes.

And the letter dated 24th February, 1984 is just false?
- Well, I would say that because I was not involved in the Dunblane Rover Group.

And although there is reference in the letter dated 24th February, 1984 in the Minutes of the Committee meeting you attended it must be a reference to some other letter? - Maybe this is a letter that my husband didn't sign and that is a letter/letter that I didn't sign: but I know I was not involved with any club until the meeting at the Chambers, which appears to be in 1985.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. TAYLOR: You may be relieved to know that I do not propose to ask you any questions about letters or Minutes, but I would like to ask you some questions about meetings which you had with Mr. Hamilton: do you understand? - Yes.

You have told us that when he came to your house it was in the order of once a week at first, usually on a Thursday, when you were out; is that correct? - Yes, as far as I remember.

Can you say what year he started attending your house? - I don't remember, but my husband dated it to 1982, because he was unemployed at that time.

Your husband was unemployed? - Yes.

You have told us that the frequency of the visits increased from once a week to eventually three or four times a week, and finished when? - 1989.

At first you would not have had much contact with Mr. Hamilton if you were out on Thursdays when he called? - Yes.

But you would have been in the house on occasions when he started to visit more regularly? - Yes, I was in when he called.

And when you were in the house with him did you form an impression as to how he looked on you and your husband? Never mind how you might have looked on him, but what was your perception as to how he looked upon you? - We were friends.

What sort of topics would you discuss with him? - Just general topics of conversation. We talked about the clubs, we talked about general topics of conversation, about games, board games, etc.

Would there be any distinction as to what you would speak to Mr. Hamilton about and what you would/would speak to your neighbour about? - No.

At what stage did the visits increase from once per week to something more frequent than that? - I think it was the fact that one of the other members of the Committee whose two sons were in the boys' club moved away from Dunblane, and he had visited them, and when they moved away he started visiting us so often.

Can you say when that was? - No.

Who were these other people he visited? - The name of the family?

Yes? - The Williams.

Do you know how often he attended at their house? - No, but I know it was on a regular basis.

About once a week? - Probably.

Other than the Williams was there any other family who he visited, to your knowledge? - In Dunblane?

Anywhere? - He did speak about a friend he had -- his name escapes me at the moment: he was something to do with one of the gun clubs. I only knew his first name.

Was that a Mr. Woods? - Can you tell me the first name?

Clive Woods? - Yes.

Taking these two groups separately, how did you perceive Mr. Hamilton saw the Williams? - How did I perceive Hamilton's view of the Williams?

Yes? - Just as friends, the same as we were.

In relation to Mr. Woods, how did you perceive he thought of Mr. Woods? - He did not mention him so often. He knew we knew Jim Williams, but I had never met this Clive, so he didn't talk about him so much.

Did/

Did the name Williams come up reasonably frequently in your discussions with Mr. Hamilton? - Just as a topic of conversation.

Would you describe Mr. Hamilton as a loner? - I suppose so, yes.

In what respect? - Well, I suppose apart from the visits to us and his club meetings I don't think he had other social.....

Yourself, the Williams and Mr. Woods? - I don't know how often he visited Mr. Woods, but he visited us regularly and he visited the Williams regularly.

You told us about two instances where there were rumours that some boys were left on an island, and one rumour was that they were given only a tin of mince and another rumour was that they had only been given a tin of beans; is that right? - Yes.

Were you able to make enquiries as to whether that was true? - No.

Did you believe that rumour? - No.

But it was a rumour which you were able to check upon, if I have understood your evidence correctly? - No, I didn't check up on it. I had heard the rumours, and I knew one of the boys concerned, and a while after I had heard the rumour just in conversation the boy's mother in general conversation said to me that her son had been at his aunt's for a week's holiday, and she had to go and pick him up after two days, because he was homesick.

And it was rumoured he had been somewhere other than his aunt's? - No. He was homesick.

And he had been homesick at one of Mr. Hamilton's camps? - I heard the rumour, then I had a discussion with the mother.

What was the rumour? - There was a rumour that the boy had been left on the island with a tin of beans. I heard that conversation, and then in general conversation with the mother, nothing to do with the club, she said that her son had/

had been away up at an aunt's for a week's holiday and she had to go and bring him back after two days, that he was homesick.

Was this the same week it had happened? - Yes, she had just gone and brought him back. But it was months after the rumour; it was quite a while after that. After that I said to Mr. Hamilton what was the story about this rumour, and this was when he said to me that the boys were homesick but they didn't want to go home and say to their parents they were homesick, so they made up stories.

Do you know why Mr. Hamilton brought round weapons to your house? - Because of the common interest with my husband. When they had gone shooting it was pistol shooting, which my husband doesn't do; he shoots .22 target. I think Mr. Hamilton took my husband to Dechmont on one occasion I can remember.

So he has taken guns round to your house on the way to the pistol shooting? - No, this was a different time. The times he went with my husband he called the house. I didn't see the firearms. They just went away. On a different occasion he brought the guns, yes.

This was because of their mutual interest in guns? - Yes. Not me, but my husband.

RE-EXAMINED BY MR. BONAMY: I got the impression initially you didn't know Mr. Williams. How well did you know him? - I didn't know him until I met him at the meeting in Mr. Hamilton's house.

That was the first time you met him?
- Yes.

How/

4.00 p.m.

How long after that was it he moved away? - I can't remember when he moved away. It was after I came off the Committee. He was still on the Committee when I, you know, resigned.

The letter which you were shown by Mr. Jones, which is signed by your husband, your husband has already told us he wrote or at least was responsible for. Did you and your husband get involved in the Committee at the same time? - We joined the Committee at the same time but I resigned before my husband.

So if your husband accepts his involvement in 1983 around the time the lets were lost, does that help you? - Well, my husband was involved, as I say, with Mr. Hamilton. I am not saying on Committees but he was involved, you know, more on that side of it than I was. I wasn't involved until the 1985 but I know my husband was involved before that because he was able to say to me that he had tried to get to the bottom of the rumours and nobody would do anything. You know, they would never name names. Because my husband told me he had gone to this one and that one and people just said that so and so told me that and my husband tried to get to the bottom of it and wasn't ever able to do so because nobody would come forward with any names. They would say "Oh, I don't know. I just heard it". So my husband was involved with Hamilton but I'm not saying on Committees but involved with talking about it with him before I was.

Well, you will see or you will remember that the letter which he signed said that he had no personal connection with the group until recently when due to an injury the sports coach could not attend the Thursday meeting and Hamilton asked for his assistance in running five-a-side football? - Yes, but that was on one occasion. If that letter was genuine.....

Well, he has told us it was? - I know, but did he read it?

Well, he took an oath like you did? - Yes, but did he read the letter? He may have looked/looked at the bottom and thought it was like his signature but, as I say, it says "In fact, we have been so impressed that my wife and I volunteer ourselves as members of the Management Committee now acting as Secretary and Treasurer" and that would appear that is to the Dunblane Rover Group, wouldn't it?

It could be? - Well, I mean, the letter was headed the Dunblane Rover Group and my husband and I were not involved on any Committee with the Dunblane Rover Group although I was shown a letter by the CID Detective who came to the house when I was interviewed and she showed me a letter that Mr. Hamilton had written to the Council and our names were on it and we were not members of the management group for the Rovers.

I follow all of that but take it from me that your husband did see the letter and did have the opportunity of reading it here and did confirm his agreement with its contents? - Yes, but I am saying did he read it or did he look at it?

Well, would you listen to what I am saying please. Take it from me that he did have the letter and he did have an opportunity of reading it here and certain parts of it were subsequently put to him with which he agreed? - Well, my husband.....

Just give me a moment to finish the question. In the light of that he confirmed that this letter was his. Now, if that is the case and he is referring there to the two of you becoming involved in the Management Committee and you agree you both got involved at the same time, does that help to confirm that you actually were involved in November of 1993? - No, because I know that I wasn't involved with the Committee until it was the Dunblane Boys' Club in 1985 and neither was my husband. We were not involved with the Rovers Group at all and I can swear that on oath, that I wasn't. I had nothing to do with the Dunblane Rovers Group. Nothing.

MR. BONOMOY: Now, sir, that completes the oral evidence I propose leading today. I anticipate certain further oral evidence, in particular the evidence of Dr. Baird, Consultant Psychiatrist./

Psychiatrist. He unfortunately will not be available to give evidence until a week on Monday which is the 8th July. That may not present any particular difficulty in view obviously of the need of parties to consider the volume of evidence that has been led over the last 23 days in preparing Submissions they propose to make to you.

I have some written evidence which ought to be lodged now I think in the form of Productions largely. Not entirely but largely in the form of Productions which should be given R numbers.

Before I do that, I tender a letter from Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary dated the 25th June 1996 to the Procurator-Fiscal confirming the status of the draft Thematic Inspection Report and in the last paragraph it says, "I understand that you already have a copy of the draft Thematic Report and I would confirm that the decision on whether or not it should eventually be published will be taken when Lord Cullen's deliberations have been completed" and that is signed by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector.

The other items which I suppose, sir, should be Productions are first of all a document headed "Lord Cullen's Inquiry-Firearms offences" giving certain statistical information about the commission of offences with firearms.

Secondly, a series of four documents which are covered by a summary or description of them. These are documents relating to the form of inquiry form used by Police Forces in England and Wales. They were handed to me by an interested observer at the Inquiry. They do seem to be of some value, sir, and I thought it might be of assistance for you to see forms that are used elsewhere.

The next set of documents.....

LORD CULLEN: Before you go any further, can we just check what numbers we are clocking up as we go along. The letter with the statistics would, I suppose, be 68, is that right?

MR. BONOMOY: No, I think 69. The GMC Guidelines are 68 and the BMA Guidance was 67. So the/

the statistics becomes 69. The four forms with the accompanying note becomes 70.

The next one, 71, is the Precognitions which the Procurator-Fiscal obtained in relation to the investigation of the 1991 camp. So these are the Precognitions the Procurator-Fiscal at Stirling had. The Inquiry has already seen the police statements and the information before the Inquiry would be incomplete, in my submission, without this additional material which was before the Procurator-Fiscal.

Then lastly, a document headed "Violence to staff in the Education Centre" produced by the Health & Safety Commission and referred to by Mr. Gibb in the examination of a witness earlier and one which you, sir, expressed some interest in and which ought to be before the Inquiry.

With that, I complete the presentation of evidence so far.

LORD/

LORD CULLEN: Thank you very much, Mr. Bonomy. There are a few matters I would like to deal with.

Since the last list of written submissions, further submissions have come in or at least have been recognised to be submissions to enter the evidence. There will be a list which will be issued later today. I understand that a number of written submissions are still, so to speak, on their way here. These include I think supplementary written submissions from the British Sports Council and a joint submission I think by the Callander and also Stirling Rifle and Pistol Clubs. That may be of interest to those who are here.

Now, can I check on one point. I'm not sure whether parties have any intention of lodging any written submissions in regard to possible recommendations between now and the resumption of proceedings. Can I ask parties in turn what their position is. Mr. Campbell, what about you?

MR. CAMPBELL: Sir, my intention, if it is acceptable to you and obviously if it is not then I will think again, is to present submissions orally when it is appropriate but they could then be put into written form if necessary thereafter.

LORD CULLEN: The only thing about that that slightly concerns me is whether there might be a problem if you were to take some line which is not indicated by any of the existing submissions. Maybe that doesn't arise.

MR. CAMPBELL: Well, sir, you have indicated that concern to me informally before and you did indicate that it might be helpful if I was to speak to another party and that has happened and I think I have given him an assurance which should be satisfactory but certainly if there is any written information of that nature being circulated to one party, I will make sure that it comes to you and others.

LORD CULLEN: That is helpful. Thank you. Mr. Gibb, what is your position?

MR. GIBB: My position is that I have really been hanging on Mr. Campbell's coat tails to some/

some extent over the last few days and I may end up duplicating a certain amount of his verbal submissions but if the general view is that verbal submissions are appropriate, clearly I can excise what I need to on the day but I would be happy to make written submissions if you wish.

LORD CULLEN: It is entirely a matter for you. I don't think I have any great need for that except if there is any risk of you raising a point nobody else had yet raised in writing, in which case it might be fair if some notice is given of that.

MR. GIBB: I am quite happy to go along with verbal submissions.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you. Mr. Jones?

MR. JONES: Sir, I would not be making any recommendations and therefore I am not covered by the enquiry your lordship is making.

LORD CULLEN: Mr. Taylor?

MR. TAYLOR: There is still an outstanding document I promised to your lordship some time ago and that is in a fairly advanced stage of preparation and should be available some time towards the end of next week. It is a different form of submission, however, from what has been discussed up until now because it is a document from the Chief Constable. Insofar as there is a submission on the evidence then if the view is that the submission should be delivered orally then I will go along with that.

In my submission, it is on occasion of considerable advantage for the written submissions to be prepared and exchanged at a point of time in advance of the oral submissions because that affords an opportunity to make some preparation in response to any criticisms which might be made.

LORD CULLEN: I think at the moment all I am talking about is written submissions in regard to possible recommendations because the invitation that was made to the world at large was also extended to the parties and I simply want to know whether the parties are going to take up that invitation by giving me written submissions as distinct from making/making oral submissions when we resume. You have something in preparation?

MR. TAYLOR: Something in preparation coming not from my pen but from the pen of the Chief Constable.

LORD CULLEN: Well, that is very helpful. Thank you very much.

Now, as far as oral submissions are concerned, obviously parties will wish to devote some attention insofar as interests extend to (a) the circumstances that we have had explored over the last so many days, as distinct from secondly the possible area for recommendations. So far as the circumstances are concerned, I don't think I would want parties to feel that they have to prepare elaborate statements of fact as to what should be found established. I think that would be far too large an imposition. I am much more concerned with matters of fact to which observations or comments may be directed. I am not wishing to prevent anyone from presenting any presentation on the facts they want to but I am most particularly concerned with matters of observations or comments on the evidence that we have heard. There are a few instances in which evidence has been conflicting or uncertain and I think there are one or two instances where questions of credibility arise and I won't say what that is but I would like to hear what parties have got to say about that.

As regards possible recommendations, I don't think I need to add to what I have said earlier.

I don't at the moment, Mr. Taylor, feel any need to require any advance notice to be given. Are there any particular matters which are concerning you as to the future?

MR. TAYLOR: If I knew of the matter I would not be asking for the submissions in writing, sir.

LORD CULLEN: I think we should take things as they come. I think that somebody in your position will have a fair idea of what some other party might want to say in due course.

MR./

MR. TAYLOR: Yes.

LORD CULLEN: So far as the order of submissions is concerned, it might help if I said a bit about that now. I would intend to call on Mr. Bonomy to speak first insofar as he feels it necessary to address me on matters. Then I will call on the parties in the order in which they have been questioning and when that is done it may well be that Mr. Bonomy will wish to give me some further assistance in the light of what parties have said.

There is one other matter which has given me some concern. I have a strong impression that at least one of the parties here will wish to make certain submissions as to recommendations in regard to restriction of availability of firearms and ammunition or the like. I am quite anxious to make sure that I have a proper debate in which there is a proper contradicter so I have decided, and I have been thinking about this for some time, on my own initiative to invite representatives of what I might call the umbrella bodies to be present so that if they wish they can have their interests responded to in whatever submission may be made in that direction. I have therefore invited, and this invitation has been accepted, any legal representative of the British Shooting Sports Council and the Scottish Target Shooting Federation to be present whilst the submissions are taking place. This is an invitation which, as I say, I have made entirely on my own initiative. They don't come as parties to the Inquiry. They come here to assist me in trying to make sure that any submissions that are made are fully scrutinised and it is of course a response rather than to advance the case which they have already set down in their written submissions.

One other thing. Mrs. McKeand has reminded me to tell you that the Inquiry office will remain open here next week in the usual way so that if any party requires to be in contact with her, that can be done as usual.

Very well, we will now adjourn until Monday the 8th of July at 10 a.m.

Adjourned until Monday, 8th July at

MONDAY, 8th JULY, 1996.

TWENTY-FOURTH DAY.

JAMES WILLIAMS (51), Sworn:

EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMY: Do you live in Galashiels? - In Galashiels now, yes.

Do you work as a computer consultant? - Yes.

You used to live in Dunblane? - Yes.

When was that? - 1982 to 1985.

And you have two sons who were quite young in these days? - Yes.

Their names? - Stephen Charles and Andrew James.

When you first lived in Dunblane what ages were they? - (No answer).

For a computer consultant it shouldn't be too much of a problem? - I think Stephen was 10 and Andrew was eight.

So they were in the age group what we have heard Thomas Hamilton ran boys clubs for? - Yes.

Did you first hear of Hamilton from them or did you meet him yourself? - No, I first heard rumours at work.

Even before the kids mentioned him? - Yes.

Where were you working then? - Burroughs Machines, Cumbernauld.

That is some distance from Dunblane. Were there other people from Dunblane working there? - Yes.

And/

And what kind of rumours did you hear? - Just that he was strange.

Anything more specific than "strange"? - Well, I used to travel down with three men to work, after I first moved to Dunblane, I travelled with three men and I think the words were "pervert".

How did the subject come up? - When we moved to Dunblane I think it was just talk, you know, in the car, and on the way to work. I don't have a great recollection of anything but.....

You can't focus on what may have been the common interest of three men in a car going to work that would raise the subject of Thomas Hamilton? - Not at the moment. I don't remember, sorry.

What school did your two boys go to? - Started off at Dunblane Primary.

How did they get to know about Hamilton? - Well, when they started at Dunblane they came home one night and said that at Assembly they had been warned about Hamilton who ran boys clubs, to avoid him. I mean, this may be not the correct words, but that sort of -- to avoid this man.

That message had been given to them at school? - Yes.

Did they say where in the context of the school that was given to them? - They said it was in the Assembly in the morning.

Can you tell me whether mention was made of him running clubs in that context? - Oh, yes.

So it was 'stay away from his club'? - More or less, because when Stephen that night, after he had been told, said that he wanted to join the club, and Andrew, who was a bit younger, he wasn't so sporty, but because his brother was doing it he wanted to do it.

In your original statement to the police you gave the impression that your sons had actually been attending the club before they were warned off, as it were, at school? - No.

What/

What is your best recollection of that? - No, I am sorry, they were warned at Assembly and they came back and said they wanted to join this club.

Did you allow them to join? - Yes, but only on the condition I could go up and see for myself.

When they first went did they go together or did one start before the other? - No, they both went together.

And did you go with them? - I went with them, yes.

Where was the club held? - Dunblane High School, in the gym.

Is this fairly shortly after you first moved to Dunblane?
- It wasn't long after we moved. I can't be specific but it wasn't long after we moved to Dunblane.

The first time they went did you go with them? - Yes, I did.

Did you speak to Hamilton? - I did speak to Hamilton.

Have you any clear recollection about whether he was there in the supervisory capacity on his own? - He was there on his own that first night, because I went up and said that my kids would like to join, but I was a bit perturbed with what I had heard, and that I wanted to see what was going on in the club for myself.

Did you tell them what you had heard? - I said I had heard rumours I didn't like, and he seemed to respect me for that, because he already knew what people were saying about him.

Was the word "pervert" used in that conversation? - No, oh no.

Just rumours? - I said I just heard rumours I didn't like, to that effect, and I would like to see what happened for myself.

What/

What was his reaction to this reference to rumours? - He was quite happy I was up-front with him.

Did he say anything to explain himself? - No.

Did your two boys participate in the club that night? - They did, yes.

Can you remember how many children were there? - I think there was about four or five from Bannockburn, maybe two or three from Stirling, and there was probably about 12 including my two.

Did Hamilton say anything about what he was trying to achieve in these clubs? - What he said to me was he tried to get the boys a little discipline. His theory in life was if you can learn discipline now it will help you later on in life.

How long did you stay the first night? - I stayed all night.

Did you watch the activities? - I did.

Could you describe what you saw? - Just mainly gym, press-ups, the vault and the horse, the bars -- I can't remember what you call it, the bars, press-ups on the bars.

Did the work that you saw the children doing seem within their capabilities? - Yes. He did watch that. Where he found -- if he thought it was too much for them he put them into the second group. There was actually two groups, one group that did exceptionally well and the other group that was not quite so good.

Was the session well disciplined? - I thought it was.

What were the children wearing? - T-shirts, shorts and plimsolls, because it was a gym floor; they couldn't use their shoes.

Was there any conversation with him that evening about how well the club was doing? - He was always very excited about his clubs and he -- the/

the first night I was there there was talk about myself sort of joining with him as a parents' representative.

Did he say why he needed your help? - He thought it would help if there was a parent with children helping him with the club.

Did you do that? - Yes, I did.

How quickly after your first visit did you get involved?
- Really it was after the first visit.

In what capacity in the club did you help him? - I was just there as a helper and also -- if I can go off the subject a bit for a second: he seemed to have a problem communicating with parents and he could communicate with children but he seemed to have a problem communicating with parents. Now, on that first night we seemed to communicate quite freely, and I could communicate with parents and I could also communicate with him, so I was I think the sort of middle man between him and the parents, if that makes sense.

Did you have any particular duties as a result of being the middle man? - After that, what he said was he wanted to make it well, legal. I am afraid I did leave a lot of this in his hands. He said before I could work with children I would have to have a police check and I would have to get in touch with Central Region to see if that was acceptable. Now, I think it was three, four, maybe five weeks after that he said "Everything is acceptable. You are now a representative of Dunblane Boys Club". This had nothing to do with the rest of his clubs, only with Dunblane Boys Club.

Did that mean that you did anything in particular so far as talking to parents was concerned? - Yes.

What did you do? - If parents had any worries they couldn't ask Mr. Hamilton they asked myself. They could talk to me because I was a parent, I had children too, and if they had fears I could talk to them as a parent -- sorry, they asked my opinion about it, being a parent, how I felt the club was run, was there any problem, and at the time I/

I had to honestly say I could see no problem.

What was the problem they were hinting at or specifically mentioning? - The rumours about him, about being a pervert.

So parents did come up with that to you and ask you what you thought about the running of the club? - After I was involved, yes, they would say: well, you are involved, how do you find it, what is your view of it, because I had two boys there at that club.

And what was your view? - As I say, I found nothing untoward, just that -- he seemed to think it was quite a good idea, he was just trying to get some discipline into the boys.

Did you actually do any work in the club during the evening? - Not myself, no, because I am not qualified.

You didn't catch boys or help with exercises? - No, just sort of overseeing, if you like, and there was another person there.

Did you wear a tracksuit or anything like that so that you might look like a coach? - Never, no.

Did you transport any of the kids back and forward? - Yes.

Apart from your own? - Yes.

Use your car for that? - Yes, I used my own car or the Transit van.

Whose van was that? - That was Thomas Hamilton's, because this was -- he used to pick up boys from Bannockburn and Stirling and take them across.

Can you remember what the name of the club was when you first became involved with it? - Dunblane Boys Club.

Was it after you were involved that he ran into difficulty with the let of the premises he had with Central Regional Council? - I think that was/was about a year after I started.

And there was a period when he didn't have use of the High School? - That is right.

The evidence so far suggests that up until that point at least the club was called The Rovers, and following that problem the name was changed to Dunblane Boys Club? - I pass on that one.

You have no particular recollection? - No, it was always Dunblane Boys Club. There was the other one, Bannockburn Rovers, but I had nothing to do with that one.

We have seen the name Dunblane Rover Group in correspondence and we have seen the local authority Minutes where one problem they say was the use of the words "Rover" suggesting a link with the Scouts. Now, you don't remember anything about that? - Sorry, no, I can't recollect that.

When you ran into difficulty with the use of the premises did you become involved in helping him out? - Yes.

What was your involvement there? - We did a -- we went round collecting -- we did a petition and collected signatures from parents.

You will be given a folder with some documents in it which is HV and you will be shown E50 in HV which is also DCRC/AL/F1/15. You will see that is a hand-written document to the Director of Administration and Legal Services at Stirling dated 2nd November 1983? - Yes.

Does your home address appear hand-written on it? - Yes.

Whose writing is that? - My ex-wife's.

You will see the heading on the paper is "Dunblane Rover Group"? - Yes.

And under that "J. Williams representative of parents"? - That is right.

Then your ex-wife's writing with your home/home address? - Yes.

And it is a petition by parents of the boys attending the Rover Group asking for reinstatement of the use of the High School? - I remember that, yes.

So that is what you were telling us about a moment ago, gathering a petition? - Yes.

In support of Mr. Hamilton? - Yes.

And if you look at the second page you will see it does end up with "They are all proud to have Mr. Thomas Hamilton in charge of their boys"? - Yes.

And it is signed "Yours faithfully, The parents listed over"? - Yes.

And there are I can tell you 70 signatures but I don't think that yours is actually one of them. Could you just have a look and tell me if your signature is there? - Yes, mine is the bottom of the second.

On my copy it is obliterated? - It is very, very faint.

And I think your ex-wife is the third one on that page? - Yes.

Do you remember actually going round doors and collecting these signatures or was it she who did that? - If I remember correctly we both did.

Do you remember whether or not you went to doors where people refused to sign? - Offhand I would say I can't remember any refusal.

These documents have "Dunblane Rover Group" at the top. Does that help you to remember whether or not the group was actually called Dunblane Rover Group when you started? - No, I don't remember "Dunblane Rover".

But this is a genuine petition that you recollect? - Yes.

Either/

Either that or is it a major forgery exercise, but we have 70 genuine-looking signatures and what looks like your ex-wife's handwriting? - That is right. But I don't remember the heading.

But it appears on every one of these pages; is that right? - Right.

And the ones with the signatures are headed up "Management Committee - Dunblane Rover Group"; is that correct? - Yes, that is correct.

Did you also write a letter of support for Mr. Hamilton? - I can't remember.

Well, if you look also in the same volume to D49. There is a series of letters and there is one from you which is 7AF. Have you got that? - Yes.

Did you write that letter? - Yes, that is my writing.

Dated 2nd November 1983? - Yes.

If you look at the third line of the actual text, referring to the let of Dunblane High School, "This was formerly used by Dunblane Rover Group on a Thursday night"? - Yes.

You have actually written that? - Yes.

So/

10.20 a.m.

So it looks as though you must have known it as the Rover Group at that time? - Yes. I must apologise for that; I totally forgot.

Well, it is a long time ago? - I can't remember it being called the Rover Group. I take your point. It could have been the Rover Group when it first started, and according to this it was.

In the last sentence of the second page you say "I frequently helped out at various activities and have seen for myself the standards achieved by the boys"? - Yes.

"Also, as Chairman of the Parents Committee and answerable to the same I would greatly appreciate a written explanation of why the let was terminated so suddenly and without proper consultation with any of the group"? - Yes.

Was there a Committee at that stage? - As far as I know it was just Tom Hamilton and myself.

Is it possible you wrote this out on the basis of what he suggested to you? - I have no answer for that.

If you look also at 7A(I) which should be just after your letter, you will see another one, written by your son Stephen, a short one? - Yes.

Does that look like his writing? - Yes.

That starts off "Please would you ask the Council to give us our Rovers back"? - Yes.

Do you remember that being written at all? - Not now, no.

Anyway, you got support in the petition, and you and a number of people you would be aware wrote letters? - Yes.

Was there eventually an arrangement arrived at to enable the club to resume its activity? - Yes.

Now, /

Now, can you tell us what you remember of how that arrangement was arrived at? - It was a meeting of Central Region, but I can't remember that meeting at all.

Do you not? - No. I must have been there. My name is on the Minutes. I have a recollection of a room with some people in it, but it is too long ago now.

A different volume of papers will be put in front of you, J1D78. Now, these pages reflect the Minutes of meetings of the Regional Council Education Committee. If you look at the page headed X-219 you will see a list of people who are welcomed to the meeting by the Chairman, and one of these is Mr. J. Williams? - Correct.

But you don't remember the meeting? - I remember we had a meeting to discuss trying to get the let of the High School back for the club.

Around that time do you remember a group of people meeting in Hamilton's house to discuss this subject? - No, because I was never at Thomas Hamilton's house.

Never at all? - Never at all.

Do you remember meeting anywhere else with any of the people named in that group, Hamilton, Mrs. McFarlane and Mr. and Mrs. Anderson? - Offhand I can't remember.

Do you remember any of these people? - The names don't ring a bell, no.

You don't remember for example Mrs. Anderson being the secretary of the Committee for the Dunblane Boys Club? - No.

You don't remember meeting in the home of any person who was along with you a member of the Committee of the boys club? - No.

We can perhaps now go back to the previous volume, HV, and if you would look at D53, you will see that is a letter dated 24th February, 1984, and it is written to the Director of Administration and Legal Services, and sets out the names/names of the Management Committee of Dunblane Boys Club? - Yes.

I see your name is there? - Yes.

And we now have the same names as we had on the previous Minute, with some additional names, such as McKenzie -- there is two persons called McKenzie on it -- and there is also a Mr. McDonald, a Mr. Gillespie and a Mr. Stewart? - Yes.

Do any of these mean anything to you? - The only one I remember slightly is Norman McIntosh.

He is down lower down as the leader and club coach? - Yes.

Where did you meet him? - If memory serves me correctly it was at the High School.

What did he do for the club? - I think he only popped in twice.

Do you remember the meetings of the club resuming in the High School after the problem was resolved? - It would be wrong to say yes. I don't remember.

Over the whole piece do you remember whether Hamilton ever had coaching or leadership assistance in the running of the classes, the club meetings, when gymnastics were going on? - Not that I remember. The only people that were usually present were the boys, Tom Hamilton, myself and any parents who stayed on to watch.

Were you a regular supervisor? - I was a regular overseer, yes. I had no qualifications to coach, so I was just an overseer.

Do you remember an arrangement which involved the boys stripping their tops off and having the lower part of the body covered? - No.

You don't remember the use of swimming trunks rather than gym pants? - No. It was on the list that they had to bring -- if they came without their shorts, without their T-shirts or without their plimsoles they had to sit at the side. They/

They had to be properly attired to do the gym.

Did you ever see anything that you could describe as untoward or improper done by Hamilton with any of the boys? - No.

Was he interested in photography at this stage? - Yes, he used to take photographs of the boys throughout the night, or throughout the session, and he said to me he was keeping a weekly record of the boys' progress, and the parents if they wished were welcome to have the photographs.

By "progress" do you mean what they could do or what they looked like? - No, stature when they came in, the build they were that week, and after exercise each week he had some of the boys developed quite well, and muscular.

What did he do with the photographs? - I don't know.

Did you ever see any photographs of your boys? - He took photographs of my boys along with the other boys.

Did you ever get copies of them? - I think we had some, but I don't know where they are now.

Did he take any of the photographs in order to give to parents to show them the progress of their child, or did he keep them for himself? - The parents had to request them, but they were there if the parents wanted them.

Did your own boys ever complain about anything? - No.

Did you ever get involved in the summer camps he ran? - Yes.

Do you remember when you got involved? - It was just after I joined. He had summer camps over July and August in Loch Lomond.

How many did you attend? - I attended the three years I was there; 1982, 1983 and 1984. Now, I was working, so I could only get three weeks off, but my ex-wife used to go across, because our boys/boys were at the camps.

What did you do at the camps? - Overseer, really; nothing else. They used to do their exercises in the morning, and he used to go across first and get everything set up.

Did you go with him? - No, I was working then. He was in a different situation; he had spare time. He used to go across and set up bars and horses and that sort of thing so that when the first group went across all the gym stuff was there already.

Did he leave them outside? - On the island, yes.

Can you do that with gym equipment, just leave it lying outside? - Well, he did.

Where did he get it from? - A good question. I always assumed it was his own.

Now, were the camps properly run, as far as you were concerned? - I would say yes. There were always at least three adults there.

What about discipline? - Discipline?

Yes. You would have a chance of watching him at close quarters at the camps. How did he keep control of the boys at that stage? - Raised his voice.

Anything else? - No; all he had to do was raise his voice.

Did he ever raise his hand in your presence at all? - No.

During these camps apart from gymnastics what other activities were there? - There was the steamer on the loch; he used to take them out on that. He took them up to Luss. If it was bad weather he would take them to the pictures at Luss.

Did he have a boat of his own? - He had a small cruiser called The Lady Sheila. He also hired two or three row boats with outboard motors from/from Balmaha.

Does the name Tropical Linda mean anything to you?

- That was the boat he had before The Lady Sheila. He had The Lady Sheila when I knew him, but I have heard that name before.

Do you remember a boat going on fire? - The Lady Sheila went on fire after he sold it.

What about Tropical Linda? Did it go on fire? - I don't know. I have heard that name. I know The Lady Sheila he had, and he sold it, and I think it was vandalised and set on fire.

Did you as a parents' representative ever get any complaints from any parents about his conduct towards the children?
- No, not that I remember.

Did concern about rumours persist throughout the period you were involved? - No. Once -- okay, somebody you would talk to -- it seemed only to be a lot of fears.

Do you now know the names of any of the people who helped out at the camps? - No, not now.

You have told us you didn't go to Hamilton's home? - That is correct.

Did he visit yours? - Yes.

Was he a regular visitor? - Yes, quite regular.

Your son Stephen eventually began to help Hamilton in the camps; is that correct? - He did, yes.

When was that? - After he was 16.

When was he 16? - Six years ago. About 1989, 1990.

He might have been there in 1988, in fact; is that right? - I lost all contact with Tom Hamilton in 1985, but my son Stephen did not. As far as I know, he knew him right up till about two/two or three years ago.

So he remained in contact with him; is that right? -
Yes, because they had the boating in common.

Did you know that Hamilton had an interest in shooting? - Yes.

How did you learn about that? - He used to take the boys down to the Dunblane Rifle Club for shooting practice, and he used to talk about his guns. He just had a fascination for guns. He was seemingly a member of a few clubs.

Did you go at all to the shooting with the boys? - I went to the shooting, but I never went to any of his clubs.

The shooting you did with the boys you went to? -
Yes.

Where was that? - I think it was the Dunblane Rifle Club. It is just on main street in Dunblane, or it was.

What were these wee boys shooting with? - Air rifles.

Did/

10.40 a.m.

Did it look well ordered to you? - It was a proper shooting range.

Was Hamilton's behaviour well ordered? - Yes, and there were actually two adults. Only two boys were allowed to shoot because you had an adult with each boy or a leader with each boy as they were shooting.

So when was it your connection was ended? - It was 1985 because I was made redundant and I moved from Dunblane to Hawick. I can't give the exact date at the moment but it was 1985.

Was it a relief to you to get away from the Club or were you actually quite disappointed to have to give it up? - I was sorry in a way to give it up because it is a useful pastime. You know, working with kids is always.....it is always good to work with kids.

So was there nothing ever happened in the whole of your involvement that caused you any concern? - Nothing ever caused me concern, no.

By that I mean concern about Hamilton's activities? - Yes.

Nothing? - Nothing at all. Can I just say one thing? We had the boys swimming at Stirling and one of the weaker lads, the other boys got all his clothes and everything and threw them into the water and of course he was breaking his heart. I made the bad mistake that I took my towel and started drying the boy's hair. Being a parent, you can appreciate you would probably do the same. Tom Hamilton got rid of the boy and came down to me and said "You never do that. You touch that boy and he goes back and you get yourself reported for abuse". He said "Never ever touch these boys again" and all I was doing was drying his hair. He was breaking his heart. If it had been my own boy I would have done it.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. WOOD: Can you look please at D78 in J1. This is the Council Minute and can you look at Page X-219. Have you got that? It will be a couple of pages over? - Yes./

Yes.

Can you then turn over the page to X-220 and the fourth bottom paragraph and does it say there "In closing their remarks, a representative from the Dunblane Boys' Club referred to the change of the name of the Club from Dunblane Rovers Group. The Club representative felt that they would prefer to revert back to their original name". Does that also confirm your current recollection now that when you were first involved it was with the Rover Group? - No, I am sorry. I know it is there in black and white but the Dunblane Rover Group just doesn't ring a bell.

Moving to another matter. You said you attended some summer camps? - Yes.

You could only get three weeks off. Do I understand that when you were off work you attended the camps? - I did attend the camps, yes.

For three weeks? - I was there for three weeks.

And that would be in each of the three years? - Yes, but my ex-wife was there longer than that.

That is how there were three adults, when you weren't there there would be an adult in your place, is that right? - Somebody else would be there and also the parents went across at the weekend, the parents that wish to come.

Just one other matter in the set of papers you were looking at, H(vi) and if you look at D53 within that. Now, on the second page of that, at the top of the page, does it say "Mr. James Williams is the official representative of the parents"? - Yes.

Would you accept that that was your position? - At that time, yes, but I never saw anything in writing or.....

But in a practical sense that is how you regarded yourself? - Yes, that's right.

And finally if you go back through that set/set to D49 and that is your letter, 7AF, within D49. Do you see the letter? - Yes.

And again on the second page of that your attention was drawn to the final paragraph where you wrote "As Chairman of the Parents Committee" and I think you said there was not a parents committee, is that right? - Not really.

What I was going to ask you was when you wrote that letter did you regard yourself as being the official representative of the parents? - Well, yes. I was the only sort of representative at that time and if that is right, at that time I was going through the procedure.

Just on that, Mr. Bonomy asked you a question. When you wrote that letter, it was suggested to you that Mr. Hamilton might have suggested to you what to write and I have you noted as saying "Yes, there is no other answer to that" and I am unclear what you mean by that. I mean, are you suggesting Mr. Hamilton dictated to you what to write there? - As far as memory recollects I would just have to go for it was dictated.

You think so? - I will go for that because I just have no other answer for it. Not at this stage in time.

Well, if you are the parents' representative, does that really square with having it dictated to you by Mr. Hamilton? - It doesn't square with it but there again, he was the leader. He at that time had more experience in it than I had. That was the first time I had ever done anything like this. Everybody has to learn so you take advice. Good or bad, you take advice.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. TAYLOR: Did I form the correct impression that your children attended summer camps in those three years during the whole period of the holidays? - Yes, the whole eight weeks.

How did they find the camps? - Well, they loved them. Steven, the eldest boy, loved it because it was just up his street, the physical side and enjoyment side and pleasure side. That was when they did their work. As you do in camps, you/you all work together, washing, cooking, collecting firewood and doing your gymnastics and then getting out in the boats in the afternoon and swimming and they were encouraged to do snorkelling. Andrew was not quite so keen because he was not the sort of athletic type. He liked to be more sort of laid back and sunbathing, if you know what I mean. Out of the two of them Steven was the one that was all for it.

What was it the boys were wearing when they were at the camp? - Normally they had T-shirts, shorts and plimsoles except when they were swimming.

When they were doing their exercises, were there occasions when they were wearing nothing but their shorts? - It would be shorts, yes. If it was brilliant, if the sunshine was good, yes.

That would be without T-shirts? - Without T-shirts, yes.

Did you consider that there was anything untoward or improper in the manner in which they were dressed on any occasion? - I wouldn't say so. I never saw it personally. I mean, I never had any qualms about my boys being there, even being in their shorts. I mean, I just never saw anything untoward. Remember we are going back about 12 or 13 years ago and a lot can happen to a person.

You mentioned that you had not been to his house? - That is correct.

Had he ever been to your house? - He was quite a frequent visitor, yes.

Can you say how frequently? - Two or three times a week.

And that would be during what period of time? - That was over the time that I was with the Club. Probably he would come back to the house after the Club and probably sit there and say "How do you think it went tonight?" and, you know, "Were things all right?". You know, just discussing what happened at the Club.

Did he ever call on occasions other than after/after attending the Club? - Oh, yes. If he had been in Dunblane he would pop in to see if we were in. You know, pop in on the off chance.

Did you look upon him as a friend? - That is difficult because he was a very hard man to get to know.

Well, can I ask you this; how do you think he looked upon you? - I don't know. I would say he was an acquaintance because to me he was a loner, you could never get like through to him.

But, I mean, he never did us any harm. He was always very pleasant.

Did the topics of conversation which you had with him range beyond just those relating to the running of the Boys' Clubs? - It was the Boys' Clubs and Loch Lomond and what could we do for camps. It revolved around the Boys' Clubs.

RE-EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMOY: The letter that you have there that you wrote and on the question of how it was written, just read through it and tell me if it expresses your views at the time. It says 7AF in the top right-hand corner? - The question was again, please?

Does that express your views at the time? - I would say it expressed my views with more than a little help.

Well, if you look at the second paragraph there it starts off "A group catering for some 70 boys in the area under the leadership of Mr. Thomas Hamilton and is of great value to the children"? - Yes.

Was that your opinion? - Well, it depends on what the children want out of it.

Was that your opinion, that it was of great value to the children? - At the time probably, yes.

And was it catering for some 70 boys at that time? - That was the number I got.

Well, did you see 70 boys coming to it? - Never at one time, no.

Over/

Over the piece there were 70 different boys who went?
- Yes, but I think the numbers he was picking up there was the ones he had from Bannockburn and Stirling because remember he was running about three or four Clubs at the one time.

The next sentence says "I have two boys who have previously attended the Cub Scouts and Shipmates without enthusiasm but as for the Rovers, it is much more than just a weekly meeting, more a training course for life itself". Now, is that what it was and is that a reference to the position at the time? - Well, at the time, yes. The Club was very good.

So do you agree with what is in the letter? - Yes, at that time.

MR. BONOMOY: Sir, on the 1st July further inquiry was made on my instructions into the evidence given by Mr. Mercer who is the caretaker at Menstrie Leisure Centre. When he gave evidence to the Inquiry he indicated that he had a telephone conversation with Thomas Hamilton on Tuesday, 12th March. On checking his police statement I noted that he then, when interviewed by the police, gave a date for that conversation of Thursday 7th March.

Normally such discrepancies in dates are not terribly important since it is not unusual for a witness to give an accurate account nearer the time and not quite such an accurate account when asked a bit later and the date may not be terribly important but bearing in mind the suggestion in evidence was the day before the incident at Dunblane, I thought it appropriate to have this matter checked again.

Having had time to think about it, Mr. Mercer wishes me to make clear to the Inquiry that the version he originally gave to the police, that is Thursday, 7th March, is the accurate version, to the best of his recollection, of the date on which he had the conversation with Hamilton. You will remember, sir, that was about Hamilton's efforts to book the mini-bus for the following week.

Now, I don't consider it necessary to re-call Mr. Mercer but it is something which one can fully understand happening in the context of this Inquiry and I think that that at least provides some clarification/clarification about when the last contact with Mr. Mercer was.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you. I am content to take a note of that.

MR. BONOMY: Thank you, sir. The next witness then is John Baird.

JOHN ALEXANDER BAIRD (48), Sworn:

EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMY: Are you a Consultant Forensic Psychiatrist? - Yes.

Presently based where? - At Leverndale Hospital and the Douglas Inche Clinic in Glasgow. I work at Barlinnie Prison and Greenock Prison.

What are your professional qualifications? - M.D., F.R.C. Psyc. and D.C.H.

How long have you been a qualified medical practitioner? - 24 years.

And how long have you been practising psychiatry? - Psychiatry, 20 years.

And forensic psychiatry? - 15 years.

What is forensic psychiatry? - It is the branch of psychiatry which deals, to a very considerable extent, with people who are involved in the criminal justice system at some stage or another and may suffer from mental disorder.

Your experience in that field has been varied I understand, is that right? - That is correct.

Can you give us a brief outline of your experience in forensic psychiatry? - In terms of where I worked?

Yes? - For 12 years I was at the State Hospital at Carstairs. For seven years of that time/time I was the Physician Superintendent at the State Hospital.

Does that mean you were in charge? - Yes, and also during the last 15 years I have been a member of the Parole Board for Scotland, I have been the Chairman of a Committee called the Standing Committee on difficult prisoners which deals with particular groups of prisoners in the prison system. I am a member at the moment of the Advisory Committee on prisoner management which is another group which deals with particular types of prisoners.

Now/

11 a.m.

Now, when was it you left the State Hospital? - 1993.

And what have you been doing since then? - I have been a consultant forensic psychiatrist in Glasgow.

And does that mean that your experience more recently has been of a wider nature? - Yes.

Your instructions to become involved in this Inquiry came from the Procurator-Fiscal at Stirling? - That is correct.

And you were asked to become involved before there was evidence led? - That is correct, yes.

And I think that as a result you had to set about putting together for your own information as much information as you could get from a number of sources? - That is correct.

What were your initial sources? - My initial sources were Thomas Hamilton's mother and the lady with whom she was living at that time, Miss Sutherland; documents provided for me by Mr. Miller.....

That is the Procurator-Fiscal? - That is the Procurator-Fiscal at Stirling, yes, and these consisted of letters written by Thomas Hamilton over a number of years; and the third main source of information came from the police in Dunblane. I visited Dunblane Police Office and the deputy officer in charge there gave me full access to the material that they had gathered. But because of the volume of it he really dealt with questions that I put to him about what had happened, and from him I was able to form details about Thomas Hamilton's background and also get a considerable degree of information about what had happened on the 13th March, and the build-up to it.

Is that Mr. Holden you are referring to? - I am referring to Mr. Holden, yes.

I think at a later stage you were asked to/

to read the transcripts of the first five days' evidence? - I was, yes.

And you provided a report -- well, we better take the order before that. You provided first of all a report based on the information you have just described and then a supplementary report taking account of the first five days of evidence? - That is correct.

I think you were also provided with a statement of a person who claimed to have been abused by Thomas Hamilton, whose evidence was given to the Inquiry in an anonymous form, and I think you wrote a further report taking account of that material? - That is correct.

So we have a total of three reports? - Yes.

You have your own copies of these reports? - I have my own copies in front of me.

We will need to number them for the purposes of the Inquiry. They will be R74 for the one you originally did, which is the lengthy one, and dated 20th May 1996, R75 for the second one, which runs to a few pages and is dated 12th June 1996, and R76 for the one dated 13th June 1996, which is only one page. Now, I think the first one, R74 records your interview with Hamilton's mother, with Miss Sutherland, the history of his life as you were able to get it from these sources, and the other sources you have referred to? - Yes.

If you then go to the top of the third page please, in that paragraph where you are talking about his mother and Miss Sutherland's recollections, you say "They were aware that he had always been in the Scouts. They were aware that he had been put out of the Scouts as a Scout Leader some years ago but had opened his own boys' clubs, but they did not know any details of this although they did know that one of the clubs was held in the gymnasium of Dunblane Primary School". Now, was that their understanding? - That is the information that they gave to me, yes.

You can take it from me there is no evidence before the Inquiry that there was a club in Dunblane/

Dunblane Primary School. I think that paragraph goes on: "They told me that it was about a year ago that permission was withdrawn from him to organise boys' clubs, but I could not clarify from them what had taken place or how permission had been withdrawn". So is that an accurate reflection of what they told you? - That is an accurate reflection of what they told me, yes.

You can take it from me that Hamilton was still running boys' clubs at the time of the incident at Dunblane, just so you don't have a false picture of this. If I can go back to the other point when I say there has been no evidence before the Inquiry about a club in Dunblane Primary School, there is no evidence that there was a club in the last 15 years or so in Dunblane Primary School? - Yes.

If I can now take you in your account to a visit to Dunblane Police Office, which is on the next page, in the second paragraph under that heading. You say "Mr. Holden himself had met Thomas Hamilton on a number of occasions over the years". Now, that is not consistent with the evidence before the Inquiry. What is your recollection of that? - I certainly recall Mr. Holden telling me that he interviewed Thomas Hamilton on one occasion.

Well, that certainly is consistent with the evidence before the Inquiry? - That is all that I can recall.

Right, thank you. If you go down a few paragraphs, another one, two, three, four, it says "Regarding his letters of complaint, I noted that in about 1989 consideration had been given to dealing with him as a vexatious litigant, but in the event the decision was taken not to do so since his complaints were neither irrational nor without some justification". Where did you get that information? - That was information which Mr. Holden gave to me when I asked him, on the basis of his complaints, whether consideration had been given to the procedure for deeming someone to be a vexatious litigant, which I don't have any detailed understanding of, but which I understand is used in very persistent cases.

So/

So you had raised that with him? - I had raised that, yes.

If I can then take you to page 5, and the second-last paragraph, and you are referring there to the types of ammunition which were in the magazines that Hamilton had, and you describe, or you are dealing with the order of loading of different types of ammunition in the magazines, and you say "The last three or four being hollow-nosed bullets specifically designed to inflict very serious injuries". I think you should understand before we come on to questions of opinion that hollow-nosed bullets do have specific legitimate purposes, so that you are not considering them simply from the point of view of having been specially designed to inflict very serious injury, although they do inflict very serious injury? - Right.

Then in the next paragraph you note that his entrance into the school showed considerable planning and local knowledge, and he took a direct route to the gymnasium which must have been previously planned by him. Once in the gymnasium it appears that he began shooting almost immediately". You also should know that there is some evidence that he went to the Assembly Hall which was next to the gymnasium, because there was a shot fired into the stage in the Assembly Hall, although no one was injured and no shot was aimed at anyone there, and therefore it may not be as clear as you have recorded here that his intention was to go to the gymnasium, it may have been other, and that would be a matter obviously for Lord Cullen to consider in due course on the basis of the evidence? - Right.

Now, with that clarification can I ask you to tell us then something about the conclusions you reached? The next page, page 6, deals with information from correspondence, and you describe some of the contents of the correspondence. Can you tell us in general terms what you made of the correspondence? - What I was really looking for were patterns of a trend or a change, and really there didn't seem to be that, because one of the two remits that Mr. Miller had given to me was to try and form a view as to whether Thomas Hamilton might have been suffering from a mental disorder of some sort/sort prior to the incident. So I was looking for changes in pattern which might have suggested he was suffering from a mental disorder.

And you were dealing with the whole sequence of events from 1988 onwards? - Yes, I was told there was a very considerable quantity, so Mr. Miller gave me selected items.

Your conclusion about the general tenor of the evidence from the letters, in the last paragraph in that section -- can you tell us what your conclusion was? - As I have written there -- may I read it?

Yes, please? - "There was no evidence in any of his letters that he was making the threats either direct or implied to anyone or to any organisation, and the letters, although rather tedious and convoluted, were not irrational or disjointed. Nor is there any impression that the style of his letter-writing altered between 1988 and 1996".

What are the threats you are referring to there? - I think the verb probably shouldn't be there. I wasn't aware of threats.

So there was no evidence he was making any threats?
- That is right.

There has been some hint in the evidence of people with whom he did correspond that there is a measure of despair or resignation creeping in towards the end, that there might be signs there that he saw his clubs and his life generally beginning to fall apart -- no hint of that in the way you viewed the correspondence? - I must say I didn't really see anything very persuasive along those lines, no.

You then set out in the report what mental disorder, personality disorder are, and you go into some detail. Perhaps you could just tell us very briefly, what is the difference between a mental disorder and a personality disorder? - Mental illness, which is the relevant issue here, is when a condition develops with features which are qualitatively, not merely quantitatively, different from normal, and there is almost always a change, as with/with any illness, a change from the time when a person was considered to be well to a time when they are considered to be ill. And if you look back at the history of a person who has become mentally ill, then that change, which may be a gradual change in some cases, or may be more abrupt -- that change can be found from the background history.

That is different from having a personality disorder? - Yes. The concept of personality disorder is really a way of classifying features of a person's behaviour when these features are very prominent, and when they lead to problems of one kind or another; and there is a continuum between people with extreme forms of personality disorder and the general population, there isn't an abrupt distinction; and these features of personality disorder tend to be life-long.

So a person may have an accumulation of personality traits, I suppose, that point to a particular definable personality disorder? - Yes, that is right.

But he is not, in the view of the psychiatrist, mentally ill? - That is correct, yes.

And does that mean that he has got something that cannot be treated really, or at least treated in a different way? - Well, it is not so much that it cannot be treated, but it would render psychiatrists of the view that the man was not mentally disordered, but really personality disorders manifest themselves in the way that a person behaves, and in particular the way they relate to other people. And at interview in a clinical setting there won't necessarily be any abnormalities which can be elicited at all. So to say that there is a personality disorder on the basis of the way a person behaves, and then to say that their behaviour is explained because of the personality disorder from which they suffer, is a logically flawed way of approaching the problem. And in many respects the personality disorder labels are shorthand ways of describing people with extreme personality types who behave in particular ways.

Now, I think that mental illnesses are classified and that personality disorders are classified/classified; is that right? - That is correct, yes.

And when you are examining a person's history, as you must do in this case without having the opportunity of interviewing him, you are looking at all the information you can put together about his background and life to try to establish whether he fits in to any of the categories? - That is correct.

So far as mental illness is concerned, what conclusion did you reach? - I did not find anything which would have suggested that he was suffering from a mental illness at any time in his life.

He did something extreme? - He did indeed.

In the most extreme sense of the word? - Absolutely.

And it might be very easy to say "He must have been nuts at the time, he must have been insane to do this"? - Yes.

Could something have happened to him that you wouldn't be able to detect from the material available to you, and could he have developed a sudden mental illness? - I considered that possibility. I really don't think that it is one that I could support. The reason for that is that mental illnesses when they are significant are severe conditions which can be really quite disabling in the way that a person functions in a day-to-day sense, and I think for someone to suggest that Thomas Hamilton had developed a severe mental illness during the days before the terrible events of the 13th March wouldn't fit with the accounts which I was provided with of the way in which he related with a number of people -- not just his mother, who he visited the night before, but a number of people in shops, acquaintances who he met in the street and so on. If somebody was suffering from a severe degree of mental disorder, and if they engaged in some sort of interaction with someone else then that person, I would say, would almost certainly notice something strange about the individual, notice something was different or wrong. So/

So that the apparent normality of Thomas Hamilton up to really the tragic events themselves rules out, in my mind, the possibility that he was suffering from a serious mental illness.

So when you give that opinion as you taking account of the five days of evidence that you also read? - Yes, yes, I am.....

At the moment we are looking at the report before that, but you seem to be referring also now to the evidence that you read, that is the five days' transcript; is that correct, you are talking about the contact he had with people in shops and acquaintances and so on? - I had obtained information about that at the time of preparing my first report.

And your opinion didn't change on that subject after you read the evidence? - It didn't, no.

So if there is something in there, in his behaviour, that might be identifiable by psychiatric examination of the information available, it must be a personality feature rather than an illness? - Well, taking the illness first of all, there was no evidence of illness.

You have excluded that? - Excluded that.

So we are in the bounds of enquiring whether there is some personality disorder involved or not? - Yes, right.

Did/

11.20 a.m.

Did you identify features about him which pointed in the direction of certain identifiable or recognisable personality disorders? - Everybody has features in their personality so that there is nobody who has no personality. So really starting from that point, I tried to form some sort of view about what sort of man Thomas Hamilton was, and if there were very prominent features in his personality in the way he related to other people and the sort of life that he led. It did seem to me there was some indication that he could have had psychopathic personality traits and he also could have paranoid personality traits.

If a personality has psychopathic tendencies could they be such that they could ultimately be described as having a mental illness, or is that something quite distinct from mental illness? - That is a matter of very considerable debate. Certainly in modern forensic psychiatry practice the two concepts are kept separate -- they look for features of mental illness and also have regard to what sort of person this is that he is dealing with.

However, the concept of paranoia or paranoid personality may involve certain features that may also be the features of mental illness? - That is correct.

Can you also see a difference between paranoid personality and paranoia in the sense of mental illness? - Paranoid personality is really a shorthand way of describing someone who is by nature suspicious and mistrustful and who feels that life doesn't deal with them in the way it deals with other people and they are forever being discriminated against and forever being treated unfairly. That is an attitude of mind which is probably not particularly uncommon in the general population although the extent to which people display these traits obviously varies, and they vary in the same individual with time and they vary from one individual to another. Whereas paranoia, or to use a more detailed label paranoid psychosis, is a quite different condition and that is when a person has delusional beliefs and perhaps other disorders of thinking or perception which are quite outwith normal/normal experience and of a varying nature hence that term "paranoid psychosis". I give an example of the distinction between that and paranoid personality in my report.

Yes, could you give us that example then? - The example that I gave -- it is one that I have just made up for this case and it is an illustrative example -- it would be an employee who had a paranoid personality would feel that his employer was forever giving him tasks which were more difficult and more demanding and less rewarding than his colleagues and he was being passed over for promotion and passed over for other benefits, and he would feel this to an excessive degree: whereas if the employee thought his employer was an agent for some sort of political force and had agents spying on him and bugging devices in his house and so on, had fantastic beliefs of that kind, which had no basis in fact whatsoever, and which were quite inaccessible -- that is another feature of psychosis, they are quite inaccessible to reasoned argument -- then that person would be considered to be suffering from paranoid psychosis. It is the fantastic and unreasonable and bizarre nature of the psychotic phenomenon which distinguish them from attitude of mind which is a personality trait when you consider someone with a paranoid personality.

If you look at the last paragraph on page 7, I think you deal with persons of paranoid personality and you describe them as over-sensitive to setbacks and difficulties in their lives, tend to bear grudges and are habitually suspicious and mistrustful? - Yes.

I think you go on to say, "They can have a tenacious sense of their own personal rights which is out of keeping with the actual situation and can believe that others around them are conspiring against them"? - Yes.

And these are features that can occur which point to a person having a paranoid personality? - Yes, these are features, symptoms of a paranoid personality.

So far as a psychopathic personality disorder is concerned, you describe that as a person who can show callous unconcern for the feelings of others,/ others, an incapacity to maintain enduring relationships despite having no difficulty in establishing them; is that right? - Yes.

And a low tolerance to frustration and a low threshold for aggression or violence? - Yes.

These are forms of a psychopathic personality disorder? - Yes.

Then I think you have a third concept under the heading of personality disorder. What is that? - Can I ask.....?

I think you go on to deal with paedophilia? - Yes.

Would you describe that as a form of personality disorder? - No.

How do we classify it? - Abnormal sexual orientation would be one way. I describe it I try to give what I took to be paedophilia because of this case.

Well, can I be clear first of all however we are talking about something that is a recognised mental illness? - Paedophilia is not a recognised mental illness.

Is it a recognised form of personality disorder? - It is not considered to be a recognised form of personality disorder.

So what is it? - It is an abnormal sexuality.

You have defined it as you understand it; is that right?
- Yes.

By way of a generally understood definition? - I would feel what I put there would be a general view of what paedophilia is and how it manifests which is really what I was trying to say at the finish of my report.

Can you tell us just in general terms either by reading the report or telling us what you consider to be the features of paedophilia and how they manifested themselves in this case? -
Taking/

Taking the first bit first may I read the report: "Regarding paedophilia, this is an emotive and complex entity, the simplest definition of which is sexual interest by an adult in children. It would be mistaken however to assume that the sexual interest and activity displayed by paedophile adults is abnormal only in terms of the person to whom it is directed. The sexual activity does appear to be significantly different involving control and power on the part of the adult and is very different from heterosexual or indeed homosexual activity between adults. It appears to be either children or more commonly particular categories of children, either boys or girls and only boys or girls of a particular age and appearance, who paedophiles are attracted to. The incidence of paedophilia is not known and it would be wrong to assume that all paedophiles behave in the same way towards children. While some paedophiles have physical contact with children and while the range of physical contact which they seek can be considerable, there must be others who have paedophile inclination who have not had physical contact".

In the following paragraph you deal with the ways in which paedophilia manifests itself? - Yes.

Can you tell us something about that then? - Can I read the report?

If that is the easiest way to tell us? - "Since interaction between adults and children is part of human life, it follows that where there is anything sinister in something that an adult may be doing in relation to a child depends on what is going on in the mind of the adult as much as the incident itself. A person of paedophile orientation would manifest this in one or more of the following three ways. Firstly, by having improper physical contact with a child, secondly, by having writings and photographs of children which could be viewed as being inappropriate or pornographic and, lastly, in the nature of their sexual fantasies. If a person is known to be of paedophile inclination then any contact with children is ominous and potentially dangerous and in addition for such a person, photographs of children which would seem innocuous such as class photographs, can serve the same purpose as pornography./

pornography. The only sensible approach is for contact between adults and children to be monitored in a reasonable manner by other adults. Since most, but not all, paedophile behaviour is displayed by men this applies particularly when men are in contact with children. Some paedophiles can devote very considerable energy over a very lengthy period and in a very carefully planned manner to secure the contact with children which they desire".

You then deal with a separate concept called fetishism. What is that? - Fetishism is when a particular object or type of object or material is sexually arousing to an individual. I particularly considered this matter because of the fact that Thomas Hamilton seemed to insist on the boys in his boys clubs wearing black shorts and I just wondered whether black shorts had some sort of fetish aspect for Thomas Hamilton.

It is a possibility with boys clothing and clothing of this type? - Yes.

Just going back slightly into that paragraph where you deal with the ways in which paedophilia manifests itself, when you say, "The only sensible approach is for contact between adults and children to be monitored in a reasonable manner by other adults". Do you mean that in a general sense of all contact between adults and children or are you talking of contact where a paedophile has been suspected? - I am really talking about all contact between adults and children because, as I say there, if a person has a paedophile inclination then what may appear to be totally innocuous and harmless contact has got other significance.

So where the activities of children are being conducted in an organised way then you are suggesting that there should always be more than one adult involved? - That is sensible practice, yes.

Then, in that section you deal with your opinion from the material you had initially. You think there is no evidence of mental illness and we have heard with that. Then in the second paragraph you deal with personality features. Can you tell us your conclusions about that please. You can read it if it is the easiest way? - his personality type I consider that he had features of paranoid personality and psychopathic personality and was also as a person rather obsessional. If I exclude from consideration the terrible crimes which he committed on 13th March, 1996 then his life up to that point would suggest that although he did have features of a personality disorder this was not of a particularly gross or severe degree".
"Regarding his/

Can you tell us what features of paranoid personality and psychopathic personality you are particularly thinking about? - Paranoid personality relates to his persistent beliefs that others were thinking ill of him and not giving him the status and the trust that he deserved. His persistent complaints about the ways that people were talking about him. As regards a psychopathic personality it did seem to me that at no time during his life did he form any particularly close relationships with anybody. He seemed to use people -- he seemed to use his mother as well, he didn't express any close relationship, he seemed to use her -- and he seemed to use other friends he was involved with. I got the impression again it seemed to be rather empty rather than looking to the need to form any kind of network of social relationships.

We have heard some reference in the Inquiry to another concept called sadistic personality. Is that related in any way to what you discovered? - I must say some of the features which emerged particularly during the second part, the preparation of the second report, would have suggested that he was rather indifferent to the suffering of others and those he had charge of. I am thinking of the reports that he was supposed to have thrown boys into Loch Lomond with a rope tied around them and that was some sort of training exercise, and the other times he punished boys by getting them to stand at attention. So there were these features, but I don't think I came across ones that were particularly prominent.

To go back to your opinion. In the third paragraph you then deal with the conclusions about paedophile tendencies. Could you read that? - "I do consider that his behaviour raises considerable suspicions in my mind that he had paedophile tendencies. His interests in boys of a particular/particular age and physical appearance, his apparent pre-occupation with their physique, his photographs of them and the way he made all dress is, in my opinion, excessive and abnormal and gives grounds for concern. I understand that there is no evidence that he ever had physical contact with children. This does not of course exclude that he had paedophile tendencies. His endless protestation, particularly towards the end of his life, resenting the allegations about him that he was in his own words a 'pervert' could in psychological terms be viewed as a defence on his part against his own awareness of his perversion".

So it would be consistent with having paedophile tendencies that a person may get pleasure from photographs of a particular type or seeing boys dressed in a particular way or say a particular shape of boy at a particular age? - Very much so.

Without having direct contact with him in the sense of touching him? - Yes.

Or physically abusing them in any way? - Yes.

Now, you also deal with the question of whether he had a fetish for something. What are your conclusions there? - There also exists the possibility that he had a fetish for black trunks and boys wearing them.

You then deal with some different issues, that is whether the evidence you had seen at that stage gave any hint or clue about what he was likely to do? - That is correct.

What conclusions did you reach there? - The conclusion I reached was that the only indication that something of the nature which did happen was going to happen was his stockpiling of ammunition. There was nothing else which would have led me to believe that in the period leading up to the tragedy the tragedy could have been anticipated, and that was the other thing that Mr. Miller, the Procurator Fiscal in Stirling, asked me to consider.

You actually say "stockpiling of ammunition/ammunition and the purchase of semi-automatic weapons". We had evidence that he had bought two more guns between September and January. So did you take account of that as well? - Yes.

"Stockpiling" is quite an emotive expression I suppose. I take it you do appreciate that he never had any more ammunition than he was entitled to have under his firearms certificate. Did you not appreciate that? - I didn't enquire as to why he should. I was considering the reports that whereas his buying pattern had been fairly low there was a very marked increase and that is really what I was referring to.

Then in the next paragraph, the one at the foot of page 9.....

BY LORD CULLEN: You were saying there was no indication of any kind that was going to happen; is that right? - That is correct, my lord. Mr. Miller had asked me to consider that point.

I think you are also recognising, particularly in the first part which Mr. Bonomy has not referred to, there are things known now which could be linked together to show deliberation; is that right? - Can I ask what you are referring to.....

Looking at the reference when you were talking about conversations with individuals and sightings and so on? - Yes.

There are indications which we can put together now?
- Absolutely.

Indicating deliberation and pre-planning; is that right?
- Yes.

But you also make the point there was nothing which could have given an inkling of the kind of act which in fact he perpetrated; is that right? - That is my position, my lord. It seemed to me these various events which have come to light, have come out, would be events which at the time wouldn't really have been considered to be of particular significance by the various -- that is my impression.

That/

11.40 a.m.

That is looking at the position of the people involved, each of whom had a different piece of information? - That is correct.

But you say there is no reason why they should not have been put together so as to form a kind of warning? - Yes.

EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR. BONOMOY: On the question of the benefit of hindsight and the point his lordship initially raised with you there, you say that there are matters now known which point towards what he was planning? - Yes.

Do you also however conclude that part in the last sentence in that paragraph by saying "Each on its own and at that time was trivial and unremarkable"? - Yes.

Even with the benefit of hindsight are we looking at a series of apparently trivial and unremarkable features which only take on significance if we put them together? - That is correct.

I think the next paragraph deals with one thing at least on which you have a firmer conclusion? - Yes. That deals with what he did on the day and what his intention was. It was my opinion, which I reached based on the very detailed information which Mr. Holden gave to me from the information which the police had, that it did seem that Thomas Hamilton's intention on the day was to commit suicide. He seemed to have taken very considerable precautions to ensure that he was successfully committing suicide, and I could list those for you if you wish.

You say "When he embarked on his crimes his single specific intention was to kill himself, and all the preparations were to ensure that nothing went wrong"? - Yes.

You also say "But perhaps as some sort of final revenge, he decided to kill others first"? - Yes.

There is a bit of speculation on the second/second part of that answer? - Yes.

But a lot more surety about your view that he planned to kill himself? - The details given to me were that he meticulously planned what he did in order to ensure he was not prevented from killing himself, that he was not overpowered or apprehended, for example.

What preparations did you have in mind? - The amount of ammunition he took with him, the way that he supported his ammunition bags with cardboard to stop them collapsing and also tied the flaps of these ammunition bags back with string in order that they would not close, all done with considerable planning: the fact that he committed suicide when there was no particular reason it seems for him to have done so.

Yes? - Had his intention it seems to me been to have engaged in some sort of killing spree then he could have continued that for longer. There was no reason when he killed himself or him to have done that.

Yes? - Even his choice of weapon was interesting; the fact he used a different weapon when killing himself than the weapons he had used in his terrible crimes. When I spoke with Mr. Holden, who was able to advise me on this, he told me that the semi-automatic weapons which Hamilton was using had a very light trigger, and it occurred to me it was possible that he consider that if he used a weapon such as that to kill himself, that if he did it too hastily he would injure himself rather than kill himself, whereas with the weapon he used that was less likely to happen.

At the end of the third line on that paragraph you say something else about your views on what happened that day. Can you read the rest of that paragraph? - Yes. "He appears to have taken pride an almost to have enjoyed the preparation for his crimes, but once he embarked on his murderous spree his victims appear to have been entirely random. It is possible that he selected a school because of his association with schools or it is possible that he selected a school because, unlike with adults, he would be much less likely to experience opposition, and his victims were the most vulnerable/vulnerable and most defenceless he could have selected. It may also be possible that as a paedophile his particular style of relationship with children was one of power and control and that this also influenced his choice of victim. It was not my impression that he particularly relished in the killing spree or wanted to prolong it, as there was no reason for him to have killed himself at the moment when he did other than to avoid running the risk that emergency services might arrive on the scene and prevent him from killing himself".

Now, the next paragraph goes on to deal with his having the opportunity to do this. What conclusion did you reach on that? - It seemed to me that he would not have been able to do what he did had he not had his firearms, or perhaps it just occurred to me as I was preparing the report explosives might have given him the same opportunity, had he had access to them and been able to use them. Without something of that kind he could not have done what he planned to do.

From time to time one reaches suggestions that such as that if he had not got a gun he would have got a lorry and mowed down a queue of people at a bus stop, or something like that. Are you suggesting otherwise here? - It comes across to me very strongly in the sequence of events that he was very determined he would kill himself and not be taken into custody or apprehended, or anything of that sort. To have done what was suggested, taking a lorry and driving at pedestrians, I couldn't be sure he could have ensured his own immediate and certain death in the same way.

So you put access to guns as a very important feature in what Hamilton did? - It does seem to me that if my opinion of what his motivation was was as it was he could not have done what he did without firearms.

And then on reflection either firearms or explosives? - Yes. He would have to know how to use them and have expert knowledge and so on. He would have to have somehow ensuring his own death, or something similar.

From a common sense point of view it sounds/sounds like there is more certainty in using a gun as he did to kill himself than relying on an explosion? - Absolutely.

That is why I am asking you whether you are really saying here that the fact he had got access to guns was a vital feature in the whole events of the 13th March? - I am sorry. You said that explosives might ensure the same effect and what?

And access to guns appears to be absolutely vital to the events of the 13th March, on the basis of your opinion? - That is correct.

In the second last paragraph you say something about his sexuality. Could you read that? - "Although the exact nature of his sexuality remains unclear, it is very probable that he was a paedophile, and he may in addition have had a specific fetish, but I do not consider that his sexuality provides any direct explanation for his heinous crimes".

And then lastly? - "Finally, I remain unconvinced that if it had been possible to examine Thomas Hamilton either psychiatrically or psychologically prior to his crimes, that any grounds for concern would have been elicited which could have alerted anyone to what he was planning to do. The only indication that he was planning something terrible is provided by the fact of his stock piling of ammunition".

If we then go on to the second report which you wrote, which is R75, you were given the transcripts at that stage; is that right? - Yes, that is correct.

And you have re-counted a record of various features in the evidence which is considered to be particularly significant; is that right? - Yes.

You then tell us your opinion as a result of that, and I think the best way might be for you to read your opinion? - Yes. Is this in the middle of Page 5?

Yes? - "Opinion. I consider that this/this additional information has broadened my knowledge of Thomas Hamilton and has caused me to revise certain of the opinions which I expressed in my earlier report of 20th May, 1996".

Yes? - "Regarding his mental state prior to his offences, there is some indication that he was low in spirits, although not to a severe degree. Even although there are two separate references to him making statements regarding ghosts in the home in which he lived as a child, I do not consider that there is any convincing evidence that he was suffering from a mental disorder such as could have formed the basis for his compulsory committal to hospital either prior to his offences or on the day of them".

Yes? - "Regarding his sexuality, on the basis of the information which I now have there really can be no doubt that he was a paedophile. The nature of his sexual fantasies can still only be a matter of speculation, but his Boys' Club activities were not innocent, had sinister undercurrents and were unhealthy. The decisive and early action taken by the Scouting Association in 1974, even before to Hamilton's terrible offences"

-- could I say that that phrase does not seem to tie in.

So we can take out "Even before Hamilton's terrible offences" out? - Yes. You will note that this report was dictated by me but was signed in my absence, because I was away on leave.

If there is anything that needs corrected please do it as you go along? - Yes.

"This action was taken primarily because of Hamilton's gross incompetence as a Youth Leader rather than on account of his paedophilia. It is a recognised and important aspect of many paedophiles that they can be very persistent, plausible, persuasive and manipulative in the way in which they can distort the truth about themselves and persuade others round to their way of thinking. Hamilton displayed at this trait prominently when he won his case with the Ombudsman, by the manner in which he relentlessly argued his case with parents, causing them considerable disquiet, as the letter indicates, and by apparently being able to persuade prominent individuals/individuals that he was the victim of an injustice. There is no indication whatsoever that at any time Thomas Hamilton was subjected to anyone who confronted his paedophilia or challenged him about it. Indeed, from what is written of him this would not have been by any means an easy task, and he would have probably tirelessly argued his own position. I do not know whether if his paedophilia had been confronted his terrible crimes could have been prevented, and in order to undertake this with any hope of success, a criminal conviction is usually required in the first instance".

What nature or type of criminal conviction did you have in mind in that sentence? - A conviction for a paedophile offence of some kind.

Bearing in mind what we have said about paedophilia, what about slapping children for what might be said to be disciplinary purposes, or not providing adequate food at a camp for children? Would they fall into the category you are thinking of? - No.

Would you give us an example of the specific type of offence which you are meaning? - A conviction for some sort of offence involving inappropriate conduct towards a child of a sexual nature.

So lewd, libidinous and indecent practice? - Yes, that sort of thing.

What about taking photographs of a boy wearing swimming trunks so he is not indecently exposed in any way? Is it easy to draw a conclusion that they are indecent? - No. If photographs of that sort led to a conviction that would have given a starting point. From what you have described, it is in my experience very unlikely that photographs of that kind would lead to a conviction of a sexual nature.

Have you come across any cases like that, where the subject of the photograph has been clothed, but something might be made of the pose or the exercise being done, as somehow or another conveyancing indecency? - I've not come across that as being the process alone for conviction.

Can/

Can you carry on now, please? - Yes. "Whether any of the paedophile allegations which have now come to light regarding Thomas Hamilton could have formed the basis of a successful criminal prosecution is for others to judge. It does occur to me that if paedophilia could have been confronted by someone, such as a member of Social Services, then this could at least potentially have assisted Thomas Hamilton in a very isolated position in which he found himself during the period leading up to his death, when he was continuing to protest his innocence but was witnessing the decline of his Boys' Clubs and also his financial collapse. He never had many friends or associates, but even those few he had, such as James Gillespie, had parted from him. Contact with someone dealing with his paedophilia could have been a life line for him".

Can I stop you there? One idea -- and it is no more than an idea -- which has been suggested is that where you get rumours, suspicions, about someone who is dealing with children, you might think of confronting him on the basis of suspicion, telling him he would not have any more contact with children unless he could give some sort of vetting process, which involves perhaps someone like you, perhaps a psychologist, and only if he satisfies that process will he be allowed to resume his contact with the children. There is no point in doing that unless that is likely to achieve the same result. You have said something about the tendency of paedophiles to justify themselves and lie to that end. Can you think of anything or any way of dealing with this problem where there is no conclusion along the lines I am suggesting, or is that just something that would not be likely to give a satisfactory result? - I can fully appreciate the reasoning behind what you propose is a possible way of dealing with this. I do feel in practical terms you would be unlikely to be successful because of the plausibility.

Yes? - The approach must involve you telling the person to start with that you believe the person has got some sort of paedophile tendency.

And until he accepts that you will get nowhere? - If the member of Social Services or the psychiatrist are too uncertain the paedophile is likely to persuade them of his way of thinking.

Does/

Does a paedophile have to accept their problem before progress can be made? - It is very important that they did accept there is a problem. What makes asking a paedophile so difficult is that they continually assert their innocence and the injustice of the whole matter. Normally you would keep confronting them with what is known about what their beliefs are, and that is a quite different relationship from the one which is suggested as a possible way of dealing with this problem.

You/

You could of course simply tell a person who was the subject of some rumour and suspicion that he was not getting any contact with children unless and until he satisfied the person who had to vet him and therefore you have at least got a starting point but the point I am making to you is that is there any purpose in this if you cannot be satisfied or you cannot rely upon the results that you get when you carry out the vetting process? - I would be wondering about the vetting process. I feel that mistakes would arise.

Now, can you go on to deal with the next part which I think starts to deal with the video you saw and we have seen part of it here? - Can I add another sentence to my answer to your previous question about the vetting process?

Yes, please? - If it was simply vetting on the basis of proven facts and if someone was going to be having contact with children, scrutiny of their background to find out whether they had convictions in the past, that kind of vetting I would consider to be entirely appropriate.

Yes, we have heard something of that. I am thinking more of a situation where you don't have firm information about the past. You have only got rumour and suspicion and you are trying to satisfy yourself that the rumour is unfounded. Now, do you think you could rely on the results of investigating a paedophile who is the subject of rumour and suspicion by either psychological means or by interviewing by a social worker or something of that nature? - My answer, my feeling about that, is that a much more reliable method of vetting would not be one that relied simply on a psychiatric or psychological or social work assessment in an interview setting but rather an examination of the facts of the person's contact with children and I think facts are a much more satisfactory means of forming opinions in a situation like this rather than in a kind of interview setting.

Can we carry on then with the rest of the opinion please? "Watching the video....."? - "Watching the video I was impressed that so much of it filmed children in the gymnasiums of school, some/some of which bore a resemblance to the scene of his crimes. I had not previously been aware of the extent to which his behaviour at gun clubs was eccentric and unusual. He appears to have had little or no interest in conventional target shooting and I wonder how it is that a man such as Hamilton who over 20 years ago had attracted attention to himself as being unfit for positions of responsibility in the Scout Association, and who subsequently had become a persistent litigant, could have been considered to have been a suitable person to hold firearms and thereafter was allowed to retain his firearms certificates when he was behaving at gun clubs in an odd manner and not taking advice".

Can I stop you there? If we take out from the sentence at the moment the reference to his behaviour at gun clubs which, you can take it from me, does not appear to have been known to the authority responsible for giving him a firearms certificate, what else in there is there that leads you to the conclusion that he should not have held a firearms certificate? - It is his behaviour at the gun clubs. If you take that out then I would not hold the same view. It was accounts of his conduct at gun clubs which I learned from the second piece of information that was given to me.

That is the transcript? - Yes.

And you do also mention there the fact that the Scouts had acted so promptly, that he was a persistent, you say, litigant but complainer might be the better expression? - Yes.

And if we take these but don't have the question of his odd manner or behaviour at the shooting club, do you still have the opinion you expressed? - I was not aware when I was reading the information from the transcripts that that was not known, that that was information which was not known and because it was known to me I was taking it into account and I was expressing the view that the Scouts in 1974 had concerns about Hamilton's conduct at the weekend at Aviemore and had taken a decision and stuck by it, whereas the conduct at the gun clubs seemed to have been going on but no action had been taken but I'm saying that ignorant of the fact that it wasn't known.

Yes/

Yes, you would maybe also have to throw into the equation in relation to the Scouts that when Central Regional Council took prompt and effective action the Ombudsman overturned them? - Yes.

And thereafter hung like a cloud over the rest of the attempts that they considered to get rid of Hamilton so you would have the view that the Scouts have to be in a rather different position from authorities such as the local authority and the police who are subject to appeal. You see that? - Yes.

This is not the first time you have remarked on the actions of the Scouts which clearly did impress you? - Yes, and it was because of consideration of the difficulties which you had raised in the earlier question about how people should be dealt with when there are concerns and I was impressed by the way the Scouts had acted in that situation. That is really why I referred to them.

Now, can you read the last sentence of that paragraph? - "Not only did Hamilton retain his firearms licences but the weapons in his possession were described by one of the....." -- I would like to take the word "expert" out there -- "..... described by one of the witnesses as being weapons predominantly used by criminals".

Well, the witness you are referring to must be Mr. Chisholm who is the ballistics examiner, the forensic scientist, who examined the scene and the weapons and I think you are referring to a passage where he said his only experience of these weapons was in the hands of criminals, is that right? - Well, that is a sentence which I would have changed if I had been able to sign the report myself. What I was referring to there was when I met with Mr. Holden at Dunblane Police Office and he told me that his experience was that these were weapons predominantly used by criminals and I also understand that Mr. Holden was a witness here so I would have rephrased that to take account of this because I am really just reporting back on what others have told me about firearms because I don't have any expert knowledge of firearms myself.

I think you can take it that while these weapons/weapons are used in crime in the experience of police officers or retired police officers who have given evidence here, they are used in the country for target shooting and Hamilton had them on the same basis as many people in the country have them, for target shooting purposes? - Right.

Does that affect anything you have said in your report? - Well, that statement was based on my impression that these were predominantly weapons used by criminals. If that is not the case then I would have taken that out.

Does that affect anything earlier? It doesn't appear to but.....? - The earlier bit, as I have indicated, is with regard particularly to his behaviour at the gun clubs so it would not affect what went earlier.

Now, can you read the last paragraph please? - "I concluded my earlier report with the view that either psychiatric or psychological examination prior to his crimes would probably not have alerted anyone as to what was about to happen and I remain of this view, but what has impressed me from the material more recently provided to me is the fact that there were items of behaviour displayed by Hamilton in relation to firearms and in relation to paedophilia which, had they been taken seriously and had they been set alongside the disquiet of parents, did indicate that there were deep-rooted and long-standing problems with this man. It was, if anything, his tireless and plausible campaigning so characteristic of the paedophile that prevented decisive action being taken in respect of him after 1974".

And again of course you are relying there to some extent on the idea that the police would know about his odd behaviour in relation to firearms? - Yes.

Now, can I ask you to look at the third report which I explained to you earlier was prepared on the strength of information which has been presented to the Inquiry in anonymous form. Now, you have provided an opinion having read that statement, and that is the statement of the person who claims to have been abused? - Yes.

And/

And having assumed that it is accurate, is that right? - Yes, that is correct.

Now, assuming that, what opinion did you have as a result of reading it? I think it is in the last paragraph? - Yes, it confirms the opinion that Hamilton was a paedophile. Would you like me to read the last.....?

No, I think the last bit would not be appropriate to read in view of what I have said to you about anonymity but you do go on to say "These are further items of information which, if they had been uncovered at the time and if they had been taken seriously and followed to their conclusion, could have led to decisive action being taken against Thomas Hamilton as long as 12 years ago"? - Yes.

But of course this information came to light only as a result of this Inquiry? - Yes.

Now, I want to ask you just about one other matter. We have been trying with some witnesses to find out whether it is possible to predict that a person will behave violently and apart from a psychic, I suppose you must be as good a person to ask how easy it is to read the mind or intention of a person before he does something. Can you tell us what chance there is by examining a person in some sort of detail, psychologically or psychiatrically, on the strength of detailed questionnaires or interviews of working out in advance that he might be violent? - My own view, and I feel it is the view generally of forensic psychiatrists, is that an approach of that kind would not give anything like the reliability or consistency or accuracy which would be required if it was to be worthwhile.

Now, from that are we to draw the conclusion that as long as there are weapons of violence or weapons that are capable of committing violence or being used for violent purposes would be a better way of putting it, as long as there are weapons available which are capable of being used for violent purposes, there will be a risk that they will be so used? - Yes.

And you and other experts in similar fields/fields or other related fields could not confidently predict which people in the community are likely to use those weapons for violent purposes? - Not with the degree of accuracy and consistency which would be required for it to be a worthwhile exercise.

Assuming that there is a risk associated with having guns at all in the community and assuming for present purposes that we continue to have guns in some form, what assistance can a psychiatrist give in the process of assessing whether a person is suitable to hold a firearms certificate? - If a person had a mental disorder then obviously a psychiatrist in that situation would be able to express an opinion about that particular individual. But as regards the population in general, I feel that a psychiatric examination within a clinical setting would play really a very minor part, if any part at all, in assessing the suitability of a particular member of the public.

One view that was put to Lord Cullen was that a police surgeon might initially interview people and identify those about whom there might be a question mark and then call in a psychiatrist to conduct a further interview with him. Now, if the person being interviewed is not suffering from any mental illness, would there be any useful purpose achieved in having him interviewed or examined by a psychiatrist? - I would very much doubt that. In the psychiatric examinations which I undertake of individuals, they are most often individuals who have already done something dangerous or violent and that is a much more common situation. The most important source of information about them is factual information about their past and what they have done so in assessing an individual, the facts about the person's past are crucial and the clinical examination such as you have described, I would have very considerable reservations about.

Do you have many dealings with police surgeons in Scotland? - Yes, from time to time, not on a regular basis but I do work from time to time with police surgeons.

In your experience, are they in quite a good position to judge whether a person might be suffering from mental illness? - Often the police surgeon/surgeon is in the first line, is the first clinical contact with the person, yes.

Yes, that is usually, though, in the sense of dealing with an accused or a suspect? - Yes.

In the sense, though, of dealing with a person who is an applicant for a firearms certificate who might be apparently an upright member of the community, would a police surgeon have at least some experience that would enable them to identify those that might have mental illness and then sort of weed them out with a view to someone like you interviewing them? - If I may just clarify for my own mind so that I know the question you are asking me. If the question is to determine amongst those applicants for firearms certificates those who have mental disorders then that is a much more clinical exercise and one I am more comfortable with but I think your question is not so much whether or not they have a mental disorder but whether or not they are suitable to have a firearm.

No, I am talking about the strict question of whether there is mental disorder? - Right.

We have heard some evidence and seen submissions to the effect that there are not enough psychiatrists or psychologists in the country to examine everybody who applies. So let's assume that there is a process whereby an applicant is initially interviewed by someone such as a police surgeon and if it is thought that he may have a mental illness he is then examined by someone like you. Would the police surgeon be a person that you would expect to be able to identify someone who was a mental illness suspect? - Yes.

And therefore there might be some value from the point of view of identifying those with mental illness in bringing a police surgeon and a psychiatrist into the process of certification? - Yes.

BY LORD CULLEN: I have a few questions before you are cross-examined. The first question I think you have effectively dealt with already but I would like to get it quite explicitly in the Notes of/of Evidence. You said you found no evidence that Hamilton was mentally ill. I did hear evidence quite some time ago from a police officer, of course speaking as a layman, who referred to Hamilton as schizophrenic with latent violent tendencies. Can we effectively dispose of schizophrenia? - I found no evidence whatsoever of schizophrenia.

That is a point which has been drawn to my attention by those representing the interests of schizophrenics and I think it is quite important that should be eliminated? - Yes.

The next matter was the question of classification. Mr. Bonomy told you that some reference had been made to a sadistic personality disorder, if that is the right expression, in terms of classification. Is that separate from what you have referred to as psychopathic? Is that a separate set of traits or does it overlap to some extent or what is the position? - My understanding is that it overlaps with a psychopathic personality disorder.

Therefore it is possible that you might find traits which suggest to you a psychopathic personality which someone else might prefer to categorise as sadistic? - Yes.

The/

12.20 a.m.

The other matter was this. We have heard some evidence suggesting that Hamilton had a very close relationship with his firearms, perhaps referring to them as his babies or his children. Now, does that kind of relationship, does that ring a bell with you in terms of the kind of cases you have come across, people having a close relationship with their guns -- anything of that sort? - In terms of particular.....

Yes, having what you might describe as almost an abnormal relationship with weapons. Is that something you have ever come across in considering cases of abnormal personality, personality disorder? - I haven't encountered it frequently. I am familiar with that sort of concept from the popular Press and the media, but in clinical work.....

Not in clinical practice? - That is right.

So I take it you wouldn't be able to help in any way as to whether that could be of significance in the present case? - I wasn't aware of any features of that kind in the present case.

You see, you were asked certain questions as to what Hamilton might have done if he hadn't had his weapons I wonder if you have any view as to whether it is of any significance that he seems to have referred to his weapons on one occasion at least as being his babies, in other words, if they had been taken away from him whether he would have been more or less likely to resort to some alternative means of causing harm? If you don't feel able to comment.....? - I am not sure there is anything else I can say in addition to what I have said.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MISS DUNLOP: In relation to the overlapping terms about which his lordship has just asked you, that is sadistic personality disorder and psychopathic personality disorder, you gave some examples earlier in your evidence about this type of disorder, and the examples I am thinking of were punishing boys, throwing/throwing them into the water with a rope tied round them, and this sort of thing? - Yes.

We have heard evidence of other types of behaviour, for example what could be described as cruelty to the parents -- to his adopted father by not allowing him to watch television, to his mother by playing practical jokes on her that she was to be sent to Inverness. Would this type of behaviour fit into that disorder that you have been describing? - Yes, but I think only to a relatively mild degree. Sadism, I think -- if people were considering whether or not an individual was a sadist, they might well look for more extreme forms of behaviour than that. That is certainly describing someone who has a disregard for others, is not a particularly likeable individual, and is a bit cruel and insensitive.

What about the "bunny hunts"? I don't know if you are aware of him taking young boys out in his car late at night and attempting to catch rabbits in the glare of his headlights and attempting to run them over? Does that fit into the same kind of description of being to a minor degree? - I think so, yes.

Would you use the term "lack of empathy" in relation to these features? - Yes.

Another characteristic of Hamilton which has been described by several witnesses is a particular calmness -- for example we heard evidence about the incident at Linlithgow Academy in 1989 when the two ladies threw buckets of gunge over Mr. Hamilton, and he was described afterwards as being very calm, of not manifesting any reaction. How, if at all, does that fit into your assessment of his personality? - That and other features I think would fit in with someone with a psychopathic personality -- lack of emotional response is one of the features.

So it is not just lack of, as it were, positive emotional relationships with other people, but it can also be lack of appropriate negative emotions? - Yes, yes.

You talk in R74, that is your first report, in the section on the penultimate page dealing/dealing with paedophilia, of the sexual activity appearing significantly different, involving control and power on the part of the adult. What I was wondering was: these examples of cruelty towards boys, throwing them into Loch Lomond, particular physical punishments, making them do very strenuous exercises and so on -- do these examples fit into the paedophilia or do they fit into the sadistic type of personality, or both, or is it impossible to say? - I think they overlap a bit really. I am not sure if I could give a very clear answer to that.

It may be that the question is attempting to compartmentalise a person to too great an extent? - I think you have summarised it very concisely, yes.

Really my reason for asking that was in relation to the possibility of Hamilton's being convicted of any behaviour like that, of him being convicted for cruelty in relation to the children or of violence towards them, if that kind of controlling, domineering behaviour towards children may be part of paedophilia? - Yes.

Is it still the case that that wouldn't provide any route to addressing the paedophilia? - I am hesitating because I am thinking how someone like Hamilton would be challenged. I can imagine he would put up a very plausible and very longwinded defence of why he was doing what he had done, even if he had been convicted. Since it was the paedophilia, I would suggest, that was causing him to seek repeated contact with children, and although if he had been convicted of something of that kind it might have given social services or psychiatrists an opportunity to confront him, it is equally possible that an offence like that would simply have attracted some sort of punishment and he would have served his sentence or paid his fine, or whatever it would be, and that would be that. There might not have been the involvement that really I was referring to here. That is speculation on my part, obviously.

I suppose it might have provided an opportunity for a more general examination of his relationships with children? - Yes, yes, yes.

But that might, I suppose, depend on whether/whether any reports were called for by a Court? - Yes.

And the particular form of disposal? - Yes.

Following any conviction? - Yes. It would, as you say, have put a conviction against his name, which would have been a very significant event, yes.

Is it just a coincidence that Hamilton, with the type of personality that you have described, and also with paedophilic tendencies, was interested in guns? - I believe that it was, yes.

You spoke about Hamilton's intention on the 13th March and you gave some evidence that he, if he had intended to pursue an even greater killing spree than he perhaps did, he could have gone on; and you seemed to derive from it having stopped a conclusion that he didn't intend to go further. I may be misrepresenting your evidence. But is the fact that he stopped at an apparently inexplicable moment, for you, evidence that he didn't intend to do much more damage? - As I indicated earlier it was for me a suggestion that he was determined to succeed in killing himself, and he didn't want to run any risk that that might not happen; and I was impressed with his planning about the event, the ammunition and so on, the bags, the way they were tied and everything of that kind, with what seemed to be an almost indiscriminate, almost totally random, it would seem to me, behaviour on his part. He didn't say anything, I understand. He wasn't selective in any way.

Presumably it is possible that whatever intention he had when he arrived at the school could have been altered by how he felt once he began? - Are you referring to his intention to commit suicide?

No, really his intention with relation to what he was going to do before he committed suicide? - I am not sure I fully understand your question.

Well, I am simply wondering if it is necessary/necessary to see his intention about what he was going to do before he killed himself as remaining constant? - My impression was that it wasn't particularly well formed. It doesn't seem to have been well formed in his mind, apart from in general terms. That was my impression of it.

Of course, it may also have been altered by his, for example, having found a different situation from what he expected once he arrived at the school? - Yes, certainly.

So if for example he expected to find an assembly in session then it would be reasonable to conclude that he had expected to do even greater damage before he killed himself? - It is possible to speculate that, yes.

Am I correct in understanding your evidence about his intention to kill himself, that that intention was formed first, or is it not possible to say? - I don't think I could answer that.

Right. Let me put it another way. Is it correct to say that that intention was his clearest intention? - That was my impression, yes.

You commented at the end of your first report, R74, that you did not consider that his sexuality provided any direct explanation for his crimes. Can you see a way in which it would provide an indirect explanation? I am thinking perhaps of the way in which it led him to be regarded in his community? - I think what I was meaning there was that although we were considering whether or not he was a paedophile, we were considering whether or not he was mentally disordered, there is still the fact of the terrible crimes that he committed, and even having read all the information that I have and spoken to people, I am still at a loss to express any reason which would satisfy myself as to why those crimes were committed by him. It is possible, after the event, to formulate explanations. That can be done, but I am still really at a bit of a loss.

It would be fair to say, would it not, that his sexuality certainly led him into conflict with/with the community in Dunblane? - Yes.

You were asked about the view which you have expressed about his continuing to hold weapons? - Yes.

And you said that, extrapolating from the known facts, his behaviour at gun clubs? - Yes.

You would not continue to hold the view that you have expressed? - That is correct.

Can I take it, however, that you are not expressing a view that he was fit to continue to hold firearms? - My view is that based on the way he was behaving at gun clubs, that would seem to me to have raised very considerable concern about his suitability.

And can I take it that you weren't asked to address the question of whether, on all the information which was known about him, he was a fit person to continue to hold guns? - I haven't been asked to address that, that is correct.

Or that he was unfit, on all the information that was known about him? - Yes. I wasn't asked by Mr. Miller specifically to address that question.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. GIBB: You talked about the role of the police surgeon in answer to Mr. Bonomy, and you indicated that you thought a police surgeon might be able to assess the question of mental illness? - Yes.

Would that require a meeting with any intended applicant? - Yes.

So the police surgeon would need to meet every applicant? - Yes.

And have some sort of pro forma available beforehand dealing with any physical illnesses and the like. How easy would it be for a police surgeon to identify any personality disorder? - Personality disorders are a very difficult area. I don't think that an assessment of personality could reliably or satisfactorily be undertaken in a situation/situation like that.

So looking at Hamilton, who suffered from personality disorder as opposed to having a mental illness, a police surgeon wouldn't have been able to identify that? - He would find no mental illness, and personality disorder in my opinion would not have been found.

And of course paedophilia, which is neither a mental illness nor a personality disorder -- would a police surgeon be able to identify that? - No.

And so far as the question of acceptance of guilt is concerned, is it right that in fact many convicted sex offenders take years to accept guilt? - Absolutely correct, yes.

So in fact a short period of counselling or the like would have no impact on many of those who are convicted sex offenders? - What I would say in response to that is that although some convicted sex offenders persist with denial of their offending, nevertheless there is an interaction with those who are counselling them or working with them which is different from the interaction they have with anybody else, because that person, as I have indicated earlier, starts from the assumption that the person has behaved in the way they are convicted of having behaved, so that they don't accept their denial and keep persistently working away at them. So I think that kind of confronting is something which paedophiles get from no one else. So even although the person is denying I don't see that contact as being without value.

Yes, but here we have Hamilton who blamed everyone else for the problems he got himself into. That is very common in paedophiles? - Yes.

And indeed in those with a personality disorder who have been convicted of sex offences? - Yes.

Even if a police surgeon were to have a preliminary assessment that there was an element of personality disorder -- a gut feeling of that -- how long would it take a psychiatrist to form a view -- how/how many meetings would be needed before a psychiatrist could form a view as to personality disorder or not? - It would be a lengthy and labour-intensive exercise, because what would be required would be a very thorough assessment of an individual involving not just interviews with them themselves but information from other sources, which is crucial; and all that could take a lot of time.

So on the basis that there are thousands of people who have firearms certificates, it is a task which would be virtually impossible? - Yes.

CROSS-EXAMINED/

12.40 p.m.

CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. TAYLOR: I wonder if you could have the first of the reports which you prepared before you, R74. In particular I wonder if you could look please at the second last paragraph in the report on Page 9. I just wonder if you could expand on that, what you mean by saying you don't think his sexuality provides any direct explanation for his heinous crimes? - Well, as I have indicated earlier, I felt in this case that there was considerable attention devoted to Thomas Hamilton's sexuality, and in particular whether or not he was a paedophile, but alongside that there were these absolutely unspeakable crimes. And while, as I have indicated in answer to an earlier question, while it would be possible to speculate retrospectively as to why he did what he did, I don't feel that I myself had any explanation which I felt particularly comfortable with or satisfied with. Explanations were, as far as they could go, were retrospectively making sense about what had happened, but this is always a rather risky thing to do.

You do, however, consider that he has a psychopathic personality disorder? - Yes.

Is that something which is measurable? - I don't think so, no, no, not in any reliable sort of way.

I may have misunderstood this, but I understood from other evidence we have heard that there is something called a psychopathic check list. There is a screening version of that which has something like 12 items which are capable of measurement. Is that not something which you have come across? - I have come across, yes, approaches, particularly used by psychologists for trying to classify personality, yes. I am aware of that. But I feel in general clinical practice that, although questionnaires like that are obviously helpful, they only go so far. If people can be categorised and classified as straightforwardly as that life would be very much easier than it is, and if we could anticipate and predict with these classifications then again life would be very much easier than it is. So that I would say I didn't disregard them, but I feel that they/they play a part as opposed to giving the whole explanation particularly in individual cases.

They are not tools of the trade, if I can put it that way, which you would resort to? - I personally wouldn't, but that doesn't mean that others wouldn't, particularly psychologists. Their approach is much more based on that kind of method than mine is -- and other psychiatrists.

The other item which we have heard mentioned at the Inquiry is the diagnostic and statistical manual of the American Psychiatric Association. Is that something which you have experience of? - Yes, I am familiar with that book.

Is that well respected? - Oh, yes.

Would one find in that volume any definition for psychopathic personality? - I would imagine you would. I can't quote it to you just now but I am sure you would because it is a diagnostic manual.

Is that a manual that is of use to a forensic psychiatrist? - It is certainly one I would have regard to. My own preference is for the equivalent manual from Europe which is ICD10 which is more European based than the DSM4, but it is a matter of preference. The both manuals are highly regarded and widely used and a basic bench mark for people.

Did it occur to you when you were giving your view as to whether Mr. Hamilton was suffering from either a paranoid or psychopathic personality disorder to have resort to that manual or to its European equivalent? - I did refer to its European equivalent the ICD10, I referred to it when I was considering the two personality features. I thought that was the best way of doing it.

I wonder if you could just remind me what it is in relation to the psychopathic personality diagnosis that you had the particular regard for in relation to Hamilton? - It was his lack of social contact, his emptiness as a person, the way he seemed to use people. I got no impression from anyone I spoke to of him as a person; / person; he seemed to be rather an empty shallow individual who didn't appear to have any particular need for the kind of social contacts and supports which many people feel the need of, which is really the basis of society. It was just one of the features that struck me about him -- his house, for example, seemed an empty and untidy place with very little in the way of personal effects one might expect in some psychopathic individual's life and that sort of way is a reflection of the sort of people they are themselves.

Would a description of him as being someone who was a very quiet kind individual fit with the diagnosis which you made? - It wouldn't necessarily be at odds with it. It wouldn't necessarily be at odds.

Why would that be? - Well, I can imagine situations in which he would appear to be quiet. The impression I got of him was that he, apart from with certain individuals when he became rather long-winded and tedious about his interests or about his feelings of injustice, in other situations he would be quiet and he did appear to be good natured and humourous. His mother and friend spoke about the jokes that he would engage in. I can well imagine that his descriptions of his Boys' Clubs would give the impression that he was someone who was concerned about the youth of tomorrow and what he could do to help them out. He was concerned with their welfare. I don't feel that cuts across other opinions which have been expressed about him, and which I have expressed myself.

In relation to the paranoid personality disorder, again could you just summarise as briefly as you can the elements of his behaviour which go towards the diagnosis which you made? - It would be his view that everyone else was out of step except him, he was being ill-treated, treated unfairly and discriminated against, and there were no grounds for this. There was no conspiracy in the sense of believing some sort of psychotic belief; nevertheless, people, agencies like the Scouts, the Regional Council and the Education Department were all against him.

You made reference to the shooting behaviour which was undertaken by him. I don't want/want to spend too much time on this given the evidence which you heard this morning, but can I ask you, are you yourself a marksman or a shooter? - No.

In order to assess the nature of the behaviour which one saw from time to time and descriptions in relation to shooting, and put that into context, do you think one would need to have some knowledge of shooting to see how far out of the accepted norm his behaviour was? - Yes, I would accept that, yes.

You may have seen in the transcripts, for example, the suggestion there was a meeting held after the events of 13th March by various members of the Stirling Rifle & Pistol Club, and they couldn't look back to anything which he was doing at the range and link that behaviour into the events of 13th March. Were you aware of that?

MR. BONOMOY: Just to be quite clear, sir, what evidence we are actually referring to; it may be important to be precise about this. I have a recollection of some evidence about Callander Club meeting after the event. I don't have for the moment have a recollection about Stirling.

MR. TAYLOR: It may well have been the Callander Club, sir.

CROSS-EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR.

TAYLOR: If you can just say a Club rather than being specific about the nature of the Club and then change that question, if you can still remember that? - Yes.

Delete the reference to it being one particular Club? - Your question was did that alter my views about his suitability and his conduct?

Well, if shooters themselves were unable to look back from the events of the 13th and identify anything untoward in his conduct which would have led them to believe he may have done what he did on the 13th is that not of some relevance? - Yes.

Would that be something which you would have/have weighed in your assessment of the position? - Yes. I am aware after reading the transcript of the first five days that there were different opinions expressed about him. I do remember reference, expressing an opinion about firearms in the evidence of one or two witnesses who did express concern and used words like "very unusual".

I think Mr. Crawford's evidence perhaps has some.....? - Can I refer to the report to see. It was Mr. Crawford who was the main witness who I was considering, whose evidence I was considering at that time; that is correct.

But I think there was evidence from others who shot with him quite regularly to the effect that they were relatively silent about any abnormal behaviour on his part? - I am perfectly willing to accept that was the position.

We discussed a few moments ago the diagnostic and statistical manual of the American Psychiatric Association. Does that manual also provide a definition for paedophilia? - I would suspect that it does. I can't say with certainty but I would suspect that it does. I honestly don't know.

It is not something which you had made a check of? - No, I didn't refer to the DSM4.

Would you agree with me that paedophiles normally are quite well organised in the manner in which they go about their activities? - Are you referring to their paedophile activities or the way they lead their general lives?

No, their paedophile activities? - I think it would be difficult for me to agree with a generalisation like that because paedophilia covers such a multitude from one extreme to the other, so that a generalisation like that would be difficult. I would accept that some paedophiles may be organised.

Do you accept a definition of paedophilia as being over a period of at least six months there has been a recurrence of intense sexual arousing and fantasy of sexual origins or behaviour involving sexual activity with a pre-pubescent child or/or children, and fantasies of sexual origin or behaviour cause clinically significant distress or impairment of social interaction or other important areas of functioning. Thirdly, a person of at least 16 years and at least five years older than the child or children is a criteria? - Right. The first one sounds a very good definition. The second part I would have some reservations about, fantasies are not by any means distress. I think you inferred that persons were distressed.....

That is correct, it is suggested fantasies or behaviour cause clinically significant distress and impairment of social functioning or other important areas of functioning? - I don't see any clinical experience they are distressed necessarily. Five years -- again that seems reasonable on common sense grounds, yes, and 16 as well.

Other than the video which you have seen one came across no other evidence of there being paedophile pornography in Hamilton's possession? - No, I didn't.

Is that something which one may normally expect in paedophiles? - When you go so far as to say expected, it would certainly be a relevant link. It was strange to me Hamilton must have known that his house would be examined in very meticulous detail and I wondered whether he hadn't disposed of what he may have had, but that speculation on my part.

He hadn't disposed of the videos? - That is right.

So would that suggest the videos at least by Hamilton were not seen as pornography? - I don't think I can go as far as that. I think Hamilton's position seems to have been that these videos demonstrated the high quality of the Boys' Clubs he ran.

You heard the evidence this morning from Mr. Williams, didn't you, which was roughly along these lines? - Yes.

It showed the development of boys as they progressed through his Clubs? - That is correct./

correct. So that I don't feel because Hamilton didn't destroy them -- I have no evidence -- the police gave me no information to suggest they were aware Hamilton had destroy anything and he may have done. I am not aware of that or had any evidence to suggest that he had. But I don't feel that rules out the effects of serving that function of pornography for Hamilton.

Taking such a view of the videos, is that something you think one person may consider them to be relatively innocuous and another consider them in the manner in which you think of them? - I think whether someone considers them to be innocuous or not would depend on the context and what other information, because, as I indicated earlier, material which can seem perfectly innocuous in one situation would against a different background be seen quite differently. If I can give you an example: the Brownie Annual I understand is pornography for paedophiles. I would never have believed such a thing was possible but I believe that it is. The Mothercare catalogue as well. This is an example of how items must be approached with suspicion.

After/

1.50 p.m.

After an adjournment for lunch.

CROSS-EXAMINATION CONTINUED BY MR.

TAYLOR: Over the lunch adjournment we have been able to check this. For the record, we can confirm that the club which did have the meeting following the events of the 13th March to consider the behaviour of their club member was the Stirling club. You didn't know about that, I take it? - That is correct.

Before we broke for lunch we were talking about paedophilia. Am I right that the only evidence one can find in the documentation of any potentially inappropriate physical contact was the incident where a 12 year old boy mentioned that he had had the inside of his leg rubbed by Mr. Hamilton? - Yes. Is that the information provided from an anonymous source?

Leaving aside what has been provided from the anonymous source. I should have prefaced that question by inviting you to do that. Is one then left with just the one incident, a 12 year old indicating that the inside of his leg might have been inappropriately stroked or rubbed? - That is as I recall. There were allegations running through all the information. The precise nature of the allegations was not always entirely clear, but there were nevertheless allegations, suggestions, that he was "touching kids"; so those accounts were going through it as well.

Did you notice anywhere any of those concerns taking some form of substantiation, or did they just remain as rumours? - In answering that question there is a distinction which a psychiatrist would draw in terms of substantiation and legal proof, which as I understand it is a rigorous proof; whereas in a clinical assessment a clinician would not subject reports to the same level of scrutiny: they would have regard to them and certainly if there was a succession of allegations they would have regard to them. That would be my clinical approach, and it would be the clinical approach of my colleagues, I know.

That/

That would be the approach taken by a forensic psychiatrist? - Yes, that is right.

If we move on to a different topic, would you accept that past behaviour is very often the best predictor of future behaviour? - Yes, that is a very good generalisation.

If someone has been violent in the past the likelihood is that they will be violent in the future, if one was predicting into the future? - Yes: the past is very important in relation to predicting the future.

In relation to acts of violence, does one often find that the disinhibiting effects of alcohol play a part? - Yes, very much so.

Is another factor in relation to violence the propensity of an individual to react with physical violence to insults or differences of opinion or such matters as are put to that individual? - Yes. Someone who had a tendency to be explosive could be considered to be at risk of violence, if they had displayed violence in that situation in the past.

Such a person is more likely to lose control of his emotions than somebody who is able to withstand the insults and things which might be thrown at him; is that fair to say? - Yes. In the assessment of violence, if someone has become violent in the past in a particular situation that would increase the risk that they might behave in that way again.

It is also true that violence tends to be associated more with the male of the species than the female? - Yes.

And more with youth than with, say, middle age? - Statistically, yes.

In these factors which we have just gone through have we really summarised the factors most likely to be predictors of future violence, or are there others which have not been referred to? - I think factors of the kind you have described are very important but I think it is also important to draw a distinction between factors which indicate general/general trends and the situation as it affects a particular individual. To give an example of that, which I don't think is of relevance in this case, there are for example individuals who seem to become violent when they, men, form a relationship with a woman, and they become jealous and possessive. The men who have that pattern of relationships tend to become violent in the domestic situation. That is another factor that has to be considered. Ultimately, however, in assessing a particular individual it is that individual's traits and background which have to be taken into account, as well as general trends such as the ones you referred to.

You were asked some questions about the stock-piling of ammunition. If I have noted your evidence correctly do I understand what happened is that when you met Mr. Miller he asked you to have particular regard to this aspect of Hamilton's behaviour? - I should have clarified this. Mr. Miller gave me two briefs. One was to express an opinion as to whether or not there was any evidence of mental disorder in relation to Thomas Hamilton; the second was to give an opinion as to whether there was anything in the build-up to the tragedy which could have predicted it was going to happen.

Do I understand correctly that you had your attention drawn to this aspect, ammunition and stock-piling? - When I visited Dunblane Police Office I was given information about his pattern of buying ammunition.

So it was not Mr. Miller who provided you with that steer; it was from another source? - Yes, it was. I visited Dunblane Police Office and was asking questions about a number of aspects building up to a number of events.

You were also asked to give a view on the importance of Hamilton possessing a gun to enable him to do what he did. I think I remember that particular passage in the evidence? - Yes.

And one of the factors which you considered relevant to answering those questions was that you had formed a view that Hamilton had decided he was going to commit suicide? - Yes.

Assuming/

Assuming that he did not have a gun just for the moment, would there be anything to stop him having taken one of the buses which he hired and driving it off a bridge into a river, or similar?

Would that not achieve the same effect? - Yes, that would have killed himself; but I did get the impression that he was very anxious to kill himself immediately, and it is possible, given the level of planning -- I was very impressed with the tying of the flaps and the supporting with cardboard and the labelling of the magazines with a sticker so he didn't put them in the gun the wrong way round and jam it. That all seemed to be planning on his part which he seemed to take pride in, and all of which was designed to ensure there was not any hitch got in the way of things. If he was as meticulous as that it might have gone through his mind that an incident such as that could have been fatal, but might not necessarily have been fatal.

RE-EXAMINED BY MR. BONOMOY: Were you aware that Mr. Hamilton referred to his guns as his babies? - I believe that from some source I had heard that said. I must say I have not gone into that in great detail, but I have heard it referred to at some point.

You took account of that factor when you were writing that report? - Yes.

You have dealt with a number of possible revisals of a minor nature to your second report? - Yes.

I think it would be helpful if you were to revise your report and submit it to his lordship with your own signature at the end of it as your final view. If you do that that would be helpful? - Yes.

Can I take it that subject to these minor revisals these three reports accurately reflect your opinion? - They do. Can I just add that the revisions would be revisions essentially of grammar, not of content.

MR. BONOMOY: Sir, that completes the evidence I have to submit to the Inquiry.

LORD CULLEN: I take it there is no other/other evidence which any of the parties seeks to put before the Inquiry?

MR. TAYLOR: There is, sir, a precognition which came into my hands in the course of this morning, which I gave to Mr. Bonomy just before lunch. The witness is not here, I have to say.

LORD CULLEN: I don't think I was aware of this, Mr. Bonomy. Has this matter been discussed? What is the outlook?

MR. BONOMOY: What happens here depends on Mr. Taylor's position, which has not actually been made clear to me.

LORD CULLEN: Do you wish to have an opportunity to discuss the matter with him?

MR. TAYLOR: That might be more appropriate.

LORD CULLEN: I will rise for that purpose.

After/

2.05 p.m.

After a short adjournment:

LORD CULLEN: Now, we are at the stage of submissions and as we start the submissions now perhaps I can just confirm, Mr. Scroggins, I think you are present here at my invitation representing the BSF?

MR. SCROGGINS: Yes, my colleague Mr. Colin McEachran will be attending tomorrow for the Scottish Shooting Federation.

LORD CULLEN: I don't know if you were present the other day but my intention in inviting you was in case any of the submissions made here call for any response by you which is not covered by the very full written submissions which your clients have submitted. So that is the purpose; to deal with anything which has not already been dealt with in writing.

MR. SCROGGINS: Yes, sir, we understand.

LORD CULLEN: Well, we can follow again I think the order which we indicated the other day. Mr. Bonomy, I call upon you first.

MR. BONOMOY: Thank you, sir. The hearts of the world went out and continue to go out to the victims of the Dunblane massacre and to their community and no words I have are adequate to add to the many words there have already been to express a world wide feeling of grief and support, feelings shared by all of us here.

I do wish, however, as counsel representing the Lord Advocate to pay tribute in a number of areas. I wish first of all to recognise the fortitude, dignity and restraint of the families of the victims throughout this Inquiry.

I also wish to acknowledge publicly the magnificent work done by the staff of the school in coping with the events of the disaster on the 13th March and thereafter for making the life of the school go on.

I/

I also wish to recognise the work done by the emergency services in dealing with a situation they could never have dreamt of occurring. It is important to distinguish areas in which there are lessons to be learned about how to respond to and deal with unique problems arising from a disaster of that magnitude from the way in which all personnel, admittedly professionally trained but still human beings, threw themselves into the task of coping with the plight of the victims.

Little has been said in this Inquiry of the work of the paramedical and medical services, including the local Dunblane doctors and those from the surrounding area, who set up the initial triage system for identifying those who most urgently required treatment. They are all unsung heroes. A decision was made to present sensitive, private information in confidence to you, sir, and as a result the work done by those services has not been publicly highlighted in the Inquiry. I hope that has not diminished the public recognition of the marvellous service they gave on that day, the succeeding days and in the still continuing treatment and rehabilitation of the victims.

Public recognition should also be given to the support services for continuing the dedicated work aimed at making life go on.

I also wish to commend the work done by Central Scotland police in the investigation of the events of the 13th March and the circumstances leading up to that day. The investigation appears to me to have been thorough, including into sensitive areas where the incident Inquiry team was investigating the work and actions of their own Force. Every Inquiry instructed by me or on my behalf has been dealt with urgently and effectively. The demands on the officers involved in the Inquiry have been considerable.

In the end of the day, it has been my decision in consultation with you, sir, whether to lead any particular evidence which emerged as a result of these inquiries. I mentioned a moment ago the presentation of private evidence in confidence to you. In the early stages of the Inquiry the evidence about the events of the day was presented in a restrained and what I hope was a sensitive way to avoid exposing those most directly affected to further distress. The full horror of the 13th March/

March was not explored in any detail. However, the Inquiry must never lose sight of the enormity of what Hamilton did with his self loading pistol and particularly the 84 gunshot wounds he inflicted. The picture we must have in all our minds is the little shattered bodies, the permanent physical results of the use of that weapon and the widespread enduring mental agony suffered by his victims, direct and indirect. These are the matters that brought us here.

You will wish, sir, to make certain formal findings about the place and time at which Hamilton's victims, both dead and injured, were shot and the 17 victims were unlawfully killed in a way which, on the face of it, amounted to murder.

You will wish to consider evidence pointing to factors which may have motivated him to do this and what his state of mind was on the 13th March. You will be able to point to a number of factors affecting him and indeed putting him under some pressure. However, I doubt if you will ever find anything approaching an adequate explanation for what he did. While one might be forgiven for expecting insanity to be such an explanation, the evidence of Dr. Baird and Professor Cook appears to rule out that simple explanation. They have however provided very helpful guidance about identifiable features of his personality such as paedophile tendency, paranoia, a psychopathological personality, obsessional behaviour and others which may have contributed.

Such evidence as is before you that he was a pervert in the sense of abusing children you may consider to be not entirely reliable. There is, however, clear evidence that he was odd, eccentric and creepy. Mrs. Ogilvie, his neighbour, found him creepy and was uncomfortable in his house when part of a video of boys at Hamilton's club was shown and she saw photographs of boys on the walls. Other neighbours and acquaintances have confirmed that view. On the other hand he ran well disciplined or regimented activities for boys there and during the summer holidays. However, his insistence that none wore tops or in some cases all should wear skimpy swimming trunks and the way they were filmed indicated a peculiar fixation or attraction at least for the appearance of the bodies of boys between the ages of 8 and 10.

The/

The signs are that most boys did not feel threatened by his behaviour. In these basic directions, which gave rise to suspicion from the late 1970s onward, lie the roots of the problems faced by the authorities which have the responsibility for regulating Hamilton's affairs.

He clearly felt victimised by obstacles placed in his way, or which some endeavoured to place in his way. I suggest he felt there was nothing wrong with, and a great deal right about the clubs that he ran, and that prompted him to battle against authority. He largely resented criticism and tended to challenge it.

He was fighting a war from about 1983 onwards with mixed but diminishing success. Interest in his clubs in his chosen area of operation around Stirling had declined and he had to turn to other areas. He was clearly under financial pressure and that was mounting.

He resumed his interest in shooting. There are elements of resignation and despair in some of his conversation and in some of his letters latterly, but we have heard evidence today that that layman's submission on these two particular aspects is not confirmed by psychiatric opinion.

The evidence this morning from Dr. Baird is that he was clearly intent upon suicide when he arrived at Dunblane Primary School. Other evidence suggests his attack on personnel at Dunblane Primary was premeditated and planned, and either the assembly or the gymnasium was his target.

Sir, we have listed the evidence particularly relevant to his motivation and state of mind under a number of headings in a document which has been presented to you. The headings used are "His financial position", "The changes in the club activity", "His revised interest in shooting", "His attitude to those who questioned him", "The evidence of his mood and state of mind in the period prior to the 13th March", and lastly "The evidence pointing towards premeditation".

I don't consider it necessary to rehearse/rehearse the parts of the evidence to which reference has been made in the document. I simply invite you, sir, to consider these as factors which do cast some light on his motivation and state of mind prior to the 13th March.

Because of the unusual dual role that I have had in the Inquiry, first of all acting as your arm in identifying and leading relevant evidence at the Inquiry, and secondly as representing the Lord Advocate in respect of his responsibilities before the Inquiry, it is not appropriate for me to propose recommendations.

You have already had many submissions made to you and you will hear further submissions from parties around the table. What I now intend to do is to identify certain issues which do emerge from the evidence.

I don't for a moment pretend that this is a complete list of all issues that will be focussed in the submissions which are made to you. I confine myself at this stage to trying to identify the issues arising out of the evidence which has been led before the Inquiry.

I also at this stage confine what I have to say to the question of Firearms and the regulation and control of the possession of Firearms.

I think logically the first area to which I should turn in trying to identify these issues is that of the procedure followed in dealing with an application for a Firearms Certificate or for the renewal of that certificate, and I will largely identify these without commenting further on the arguments that have either been advanced or will be advanced in respect of them.

First of all, the inquiry that ought to be made of an applicant either in the form or during the process of dealing with the form. There has been a fair body of evidence pointing to the possibility of information being provided by clubs of which the applicant either has been a member or proposes to become a member; and to the possibility of police officers making specific inquiry at these clubs.

If/

If you consider making recommendations along these lines or on these issues, you will also wish to consider whether clubs ought to keep records in respect of various matters that have been dealt with in the evidence, and ought to be obliged to report certain matters to the police.

You may wish to consider whether the civilianisation of the inquiry process is something that ought to be encouraged, at least so far as checking on and identifying the weapons involved, and the good reason proposed, are concerned.

You have heard a good deal of evidence about the procedure followed in the office in Stirling in dealing with the applications of Hamilton, and indeed the current position in regard to dealing with any applications for firearms certificates. You may consider, for example, the procedure that ought to be followed for keeping a firearms file on an individual up to date, who ought to get the file when the application is being considered by the police, what ought to be done about police intelligence so far as the file is concerned.

You may also wish to consider whether, if the decision remains that of a senior police officer, in this case the Deputy Chief Constable, what material he should have before him before he makes a final decision, and whether indeed he ought to have the applicant before him before he makes a final decision.

These are all issues arising from the evidence. Of course, in this case the Deputy Chief Constable has given evidence that he knew Hamilton's whole background in any event, but I suggest that in the broader picture that particular feature of this case is largely irrelevant.

What the evidence does point up is in my submission the need to consider whether the person making the decision ought to have certain material before him, and whether he ought indeed to have the applicant before him.

There is an associated issue of the part that might be played by the medical profession in the certification process.

The/

The evidence on that has been largely negative. You may however consider there is at least a need to investigate the matter further bearing in mind that the Association of Police Surgeons, through their witness, Dr. Davis, did make certain constructive suggestions which are perhaps worthy of further consideration, although it has to be observed that those who have been asked to comment on these have been able to point to a number of difficulties about implementing the suggestions made.

You will also no doubt, sir, wish to consider the question of the period between renewals of firearms certificates. Prior to the 13th March it certainly appeared to be the case that there was a move towards a slackening of the regulation of the possession of firearms: the period was extended to five years between renewal; postal renewals were being encouraged; and there was a proposal to abandon counter signatories.

You will no doubt wish to consider all these issues. That of counter signatories has been explored also in the evidence. The particular question of the interpretation of a person of similar standing to those listed in the guidance has also been considered, and the question of whether one counter signatory or a number should be involved, is again a subject to which you will wish to pay some attention.

That also raises the question of the type of information and whether that information should be provided on a confidential basis.

There is I suggest certainly scope for considering alternative use of the counter signatory procedure to that which has applied so far.

Mention has been made of the possibility of advertising applications and the issues associated with that, and in an application form the suggestion has been made that a person should be obliged to declare whether or not in the past an application has been refused or withdrawn, or whether a counter signatory approached has refused to counter sign the application.

In connection with investigating the conduct/conduct of firearms certificate holders, and indeed an applicant, some reference has been made to the absence of a power on the part of the police to enter an applicant's premises without permission.

Reference has also been made to the possibility of a person who has either been refused a firearms certificate or had his certificate revoked being permitted to possess a firearm in an exempt category set out in Sections 9-16 of the Firearms Act 1968.

A great deal of evidence centred on the word "opportunity" appearing in the Home Office Guidance in dealing with what amounts to a good reason for possessing a handgun.....

LORD CULLEN: You don't suggest an interpretation of the guidance, do you?

MR. BONOMY: I am not suggesting any interpretation of the guidance. What I am suggesting is that perhaps the guidance ought to be reconsidered, and that the use of an expression such as "opportunity" is a word that -- that that particular word should be reconsidered.

There must be others who will wish to urge a definition of "opportunity" on you, but what I suggest is that so far as the future is concerned you will wish to consider whether the guidance should contain that particular expression.

LORD CULLEN: That is 6.8?

MR. BONOMY: It is, sir.

It was also clear in the police evidence that there was great potential for falling between stools. It was not clear that each officer understood precisely his part in the procedure.

Now, as I have already said, that may have had no effect on the dealings with Hamilton's applications, but there was clearly potential for an application not being fully considered because various people thought someone else would ultimately make a more informed decision than was clearly possible, on the evidence before you.

So/

So it may be possible, sir, to formulate some guidance on how applications should be dealt with from start to finish within any individual police office, and undoubtedly to make suggestions for improvement of the guidance so that a consistent approach throughout the country is followed in dealing with these applications.

Can I now turn to the question of clubs, which is closely associated with the question of applications for firearms certificates?

I suggested in dealing with certificates that there may be something to be gained by further inquiry being made at clubs, and clubs being obliged to keep records and report to the police to answer such inquiries as were made upon them.

For that to be effective it would be necessary for clubs to be identified, and one way of identifying all clubs would be to require them to be approved by the Home Office.

LORD CULLEN: How do you deal with the ones that were mentioned I think by one of the witnesses, a situation where you have informal arrangements.

MR. BONOMOY: Well, what I am suggesting is that perhaps the time has come when there should be no informal arrangements such as the ones we have heard about, and that if target shooting is to be conducted that it ought to be done at clubs which are known, identified and approved.

LORD CULLEN: Of course, there could be an alternative way of approaching this, is to have a situation in which you have a core of approved clubs, and it is through these clubs the information is provided, and you might have a periphery of more informal arrangements which aren't relevant to the broader working of the situation.

MR. BONOMOY: If the submission is made to you, and you accept it as having force, that it is important to know what a man is doing with his weapons on a fairly regular basis, then it is important to be able to identify where he is shooting, and have a report available to the police if they want to make that inquiry. Now, the more there/there are informal arrangements the less such a system will work.

LORD CULLEN: Unless he was required to demonstrate good reason by reference to what approved clubs could deliver by way of information?

MR. BONOMOY: Indeed.

LORD CULLEN: That might be a way of getting the benefits of the set-up without losing the availability of the information, which is essential?

MR. BONOMOY: Yes, subject to this, that if Home Office approval was necessary for all clubs then the information might be more complete. But I do accept what you say, that there are ways of getting certainly far more information than is available on a regular basis at present.

If there was Home Office approval of a club, one club at least -- of which a person seeking a firearm certificate had to be a member -- then it would I think follow that there would have to be some Code of Practice setting out the requirements for such a club consistent with the other recommendations that you seek to make at the end of the Inquiry -- for example dealing with probationary members -- as we have seen, there is already guidance on that, but that would need to be part of, I would suggest, any code relating to approval.

Also, the position of a probationary member as not being in a position to be, for example, Range Officer -- and you have heard some suggestion that probationary members do from time to time take on responsibilities they perhaps ought not to have.

You may also consider in this connection as part of such a code, but also as a quite separate recommendation, the question of a person requiring a Firearms Certificate before he does become a full member of the club, and likewise, or as part of this process, requiring the club which has Home Office approval to report to the Chief Constable on the probationary member and his performance during that period so that in the end of the day the Chief Constable is the person who actually makes the decision, / decision, or the Senior Police Officer is the person who makes the decision about whether or not the applicant should proceed to full membership with all the responsibilities that carries.

Now/

2.40 p.m.

Now, I appreciate there is a reversal of the order of events as they exist at present, because as I understand the operation of the system at the moment, one has to be a member of a club before getting a firearms certificate. It may be there is something to be said for applications for firearms certificates preceding full membership of a club.

You may also want to consider whether there should be attendance and competing involvement imposed on firearms holders and whether or not the club should inform the police of members whose applications have been disapproved or of any expulsions which have taken place or any resignations which occur.

There has been evidence that Hamilton undoubtedly behaved abnormally on the range, but was never really regarded as unsafe, and it was only if he became unsafe that anything was likely to be done about it.

You will of course have to consider the effect of any restriction which might be imposed on membership of clubs on the genuine competitive target shooter and on international competition. You have heard evidence about the extent to which full bore and small bore competitive shooting takes place in this country.

On quite a separate but related matter, you may wish to consider whether clubs should continue to use human-shaped targets.

Now, sir, that takes me to the question of the weapons themselves. The handguns which have been the subject of the Inquiry were originally designed as killing instruments. They are still in the condition in which they were originally designed, although used for a wide variety of purposes. As has been made clear even in today's evidence, as long as these instruments are there there is a risk that they will be used for killing. In relation to the evaluation of that particular risk and how one begins to cope with it I certainly have no view to express. What I do intend to do, however, is to look at the various options which emerge/emerge from the evidence.

Obviously one point of view is to ban the use of handguns altogether for target shooting. You have heard evidence about the effect that would have. There are, however, a considerable number of other possibilities that have emerged in the evidence, such as restricting the type of handguns that might be available, requiring the conversion of multi-shot weapons to single shot, although I know the evidence indicated that that was not a safe option; restriction of magazine size, where handguns are kept, how they are stored, where ammunition is kept, the amount kept, whether it might be kept at home, whether different amounts might be kept at home -- by that I mean small amounts at home. In that regard you will have to bear in mind how ammunition is made, much of it for target shooting; the majority of it -- some might say the vast majority of it -- for target shooting being home made.

An issue has arisen whether a firearms certificate should be required to purchase the component parts of ammunition, to purchase the magazines. A question has arisen as to how to define "a component part" of a firearm, and whether by defining that one should include such things as magazines.

You have heard evidence about the possibility of attaching numbers to magazines, so that they are recorded; but you may have found that that would present certainly a number of difficulties.

A national register of firearms has been touched upon but not explored to any great detail, but you may consider there is some value in that, in which case no doubt further exploration of the potential of such a register could be undertaken.

If consideration were to be given to separating the firearms possessor from his firearm by requiring the firearms to be stored elsewhere than at home, then consideration would have to be given to time limits or schemes covering the periods when the gun would require to be removed from its normal resting place for use in competitions away from the home club. The same would apply to ammunition/ammunition, if that could not be stored at home.

You may also wish to consider whether limits should be imposed on the amount of ammunition held or the amount that may be purchased and whether there should be a requirement that the person who has purchased ammunition should have to prove that he has used it before purchasing more.

No doubt I have not identified all the issues which have arisen, even in the evidence: I have endeavoured to, but there may be others.

That takes me to an area of law, to an area of law on which a great deal of evidence has been led, and that is the various inconsistencies which exist in the present law relating to the grounds on which an application for a firearms certificate may be refused, or a firearms certificate may be revoked, or an application for a shotgun certificate may be refused.

Sir, I appreciate that the Inquiry has been about handguns largely, because of the events of the 13th March, but it is impossible to ignore other types of weapon in this particular context also.

I could not find any sound reason in the various submissions and other documents which I have read for the inconsistencies in the legal provisions relating to these various subjects. We have set out in a document which you already have the various inconsistencies which exist, when for example in relation to renewal of a firearms certificate it is for the applicant to satisfy the police that he has good reason for possessing a weapon and that he would not present a danger to the public safety or the peace. A senior police officer may refuse the application if he has reason to believe that the applicant is a prohibited person or is of intemperate habits or of unsound mind or otherwise unfitted to be entrusted with a firearm. On the other hand, if revocation is the issue, the chief officer of police has to be satisfied that he is prohibited or of intemperate habits or of unsound mind or otherwise unfitted to be entrusted with such a firearm. There is no reason I have been able to establish why there should be this distinction between the two.

Similarly/

Similarly, the rules in respect of the granting, refusal and revocation of a shotgun certificate are different, and again I can see no logical reason why that is the case. There are historical reasons why the firearms certification has been around in a form approaching its present since 1920, whereas in respect of shotguns that was not the position until 1967.

I suggest, therefore, sir, that the evidence has identified a number of areas in which consistency in the law would be of assistance; it would mean we would be in a far better position to understand exactly where we do stand.

If I could for a moment deal with the various tests which appear in Sections dealing with grants, renewals and revocations, at times the requirement is to satisfy the police, at others it is that the police have reason to believe that something be the case, and can act. There are good reasons why the test should be in certain areas different. For example, it seems sensible to expect an applicant to be able to satisfy the police he has good reason, and it is equally sensible to expect the police to be the ones to establish intemperate habits or unsound mind, which otherwise if the onus was on the applicant would be requiring him to prove a negative.

If you were to suggest improvements in the certification system which required a great deal more information to be provided by an applicant than is presently provided, if he was required to go through a far more rigorous process, for example, answering a much more detailed application form, in the shape of a questionnaire, having to have more counter-signatories and then to be the subject of an inquiry carried out by police officers in a form similar to RL3A, in these circumstances one could say that the onus should ultimately be on the chief police officer to be satisfied of certain things before he can refuse an application or indeed to believe certain things before he can refuse it.

The concept of making a decision because one has reason to believe it is a fairly unusual one; indeed it may be unique in licensing provisions. I do not know, however, whether it really is very different as an expression from "reason/

"reason to suspect"; "reason to suspect" is one with which the police are familiar in a number of contexts. "Reason to believe" is an expression with which I doubt if they are familiar or comfortable, and you may consider whether there is room for a different test to apply to some of the areas on the basis of which an application may be refused or a certificate revoked.

There has been some suggestion that the very existence of an appeal process may create difficulty for the chief officer of police making the decision. I note in the evidence submitted by the Home Office and the Secretary of State that in Scotland as far as they can tell only 5 per cent of appeals against decisions of chief police officers are successful, whereas in England 25 per cent of these appeals are successful. I don't suggest one can draw very firm conclusions from that, but perhaps one can at least draw a conclusion that in Scotland the test for success in an appeal must be different from the test in England, and indeed you have now been presented with English counsel's opinion which confirms that. In general terms -- I say "in general terms" because it is very difficult in my submission to detect in the Scottish cases a clear line of authority applying a consistent test to deciding whether or not to overturn the chief officer of police's decision. However, the cases do indicate that the Sheriff tends to enquire only if the decision cannot be justified: I am not suggesting that is true of all cases. The very fact it is not true of all cases means that there is a need for the law to be clarified.

LORD CULLEN: Would you say "cannot be justified" is the same as "is justified"?

MR. BONOMOY: I think you are right, sir. It is "is justified". Built into that test as well there is some allowance for the exercise of discretion. It is not a question of a complete re-hearing of the case by the Sheriff and a different decision being made if the Sheriff considers the evidence to favour the appellants.

The/

3 p.m.

The cases tend to suggest that the Sheriff accepts a decision if it appears to be a justified decision.

LORD CULLEN: What is your impression as to the state of the onus of appeal in Scotland? I can't remember if it is dealt with in your paper or not.

MR. BONOMOY: My impression of the state of the onus is that the onus is on the appellant and not on the Chief Officer of Police to justify his decision. The onus is on the appellant to demonstrate that a decision is not justified.

However, it is the very lack of clarity about the law that makes it very difficult to draw firm conclusions and what I suggest is necessary is some definition of the grounds on which an appeal against a Chief Office of Police's decision might be taken and be successful.

LORD CULLEN: By definition, you mean restriction effectively?

MR. BONOMOY: Well, indeed.

LORD CULLEN: Certainly so far as England is concerned.

MR. BONOMOY: Yes, in Scotland also it would be helpful to have clear grounds on which an appeal might be taken. Now, we are increasingly familiar with the stating of a basis or ground for appeals to be taken in licensing matters or certification matters. Examples are quoted in the note you were given with regard to the Licensing (Scotland) Act and the Civic Government (Scotland) Act. However, there are many, many more examples set out in more or less tabulated form in chapter 27 of McPhail's book on Sheriff Court practice. A whole host of different administrative areas are dealt with there and a host of different appeal provisions.

For example, there are a number where a decision of the Sheriff is said to be final which of course leaves open only the further route of judicial review beyond the Sheriff. There are others/others where there is provision for appeal beyond the Sheriff and indeed, as matters stand at present in relation to firearms certificates, there is room, there is now room, for appeal from the Sheriff to the Court of Session. Apart from looking at the other examples in that book, there is also the option open of removing the right of appeal at all, as a result of which the only basis for appealing against a Chief Officer of Police would be that it was ultra vires. That has a number of advantages. The test is clear. It is a speedy form of process.

On the other hand, it does involve going to the Court of Session and not in the traditional way of appeal to the Sheriff and therefore would be a major change.

There are submissions before you which deal with the question of a separate Appeal Board. That has been considered in the past. Even if you were to recommend it, there would still remain scope for resort to the Court by way of petition for a judicial review which makes one wonder if that is indeed the right way to go and whether in fact the right way might not be to retain the power to deal with these appeals in the Court process.

Now, sir, these are the main issues which I suppose arise as issues from the evidence which has been presented to you in relation to firearms. Before I turn very briefly to the other two subjects which you are considering making recommendations about, there is one piece of evidence or one chapter of evidence in relation to firearms to which I should give some attention.

I don't think it is appropriate for me to comment on whether the incident occurred in which Mr. Haggart claimed a gun was pointed at her by Thomas Hamilton from a vehicle but it is noteworthy that there is no evidence to confirm that she actually did report the incident to the police. As full an inquiry as could be made was apparently made of Lothian police officers to whom she could have reported the matter and no trace of any report was found. Now, at this stage I know of no further evidence that bears on this matter that could assist you, sir, in arriving at a conclusion about first of all whether the incident occurred and secondly whether it was reported to the police.

LORD/

LORD CULLEN: You made reference I think on one day during the Inquiry, in a different context altogether, to what the daughter might or might not be able to say. I don't have the reference to that particular page to hand but perhaps Mr. Lake could give me a reference for that later if that is germane to the same point. I think it cropped up in a different context altogether, if I recollect it correctly.

MR. BONOMOY: Well, it did and having considered the position I was then and remain now satisfied that nothing she could say would add to the information you already have.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you.

MR. BONOMOY: And I had in mind in particular the incident that I have just been dealing with.

LORD CULLEN: Yes.

MR. BONOMOY: Now, sir, you have also indicated you intend to look at the question of school security and the vetting and supervision of persons having custody of children. So far as the evidence affecting in particular the local authorities involved with Hamilton is concerned, I have prepared summaries of what appears to be the relevant evidence so far as these issues are concerned. First of all, relating to Hamilton's involvement with Lothian Regional Council and secondly, his involvement with Fife Regional Council and I do not propose to go any further into these details here. Copies of these documents have been circulated to the parties.

So far as Hamilton's dealings with Central Regional Council are concerned, I anticipate Mr. Jones making certain submissions to you on behalf of Central Regional Council. They are also in written form which I have seen. At a number of points submissions or arguments are being advanced in that document on behalf of the Regional Council and it is not appropriate for me to be associated with those. However, I have had a chance to discuss the terms of this document and revise the factual content of it. So far as the facts are concerned as set out there, and by that I mean the narrative/narrative of the evidence which is being founded upon, as far as that is concerned I am satisfied that the document accurately reflects the evidence, subject to one or possibly two areas on which I would propose to say something once I have heard how Mr. Jones approaches the matter and he knows the areas I am concerned about.

So I don't see any useful purpose being served by going into this matter in detail at this stage, sir.

That takes me to the question of the issues arising from the evidence relating to school security. A number of ideas were suggested by certain witnesses and you have heard evidence about the installation of additional security measures locally. Very largely, the matter is one of resources and one of assessment of priorities.

You may, therefore, find it difficult to make specific recommendations but, for example, you may consider whether all schools should carry out a risk assessment, how that should be done or whether it could be done to a national standard. You may wish to identify measures which could be installed in schools subject to the results of the assessments and the type of school indeed because we heard in particular in this Inquiry that schools often have a very large number of entrances and exits, making it very difficult to impose security arrangements.

I don't propose to rehearse the various security measures which have been referred to in the evidence. They will be clear in your lordship's mind.

That then takes me to the issues arising in relation to the vetting and supervision of persons having custody of children. In certain areas it may be that you could make certain recommendations but that would have to be restricted to examining the feasibility of taking certain steps.

For example, we have heard that information from criminal records, the police national computer and police intelligence might be made more widely available but obviously a great deal of work is required to identify how widely available and how such information could be made available in the voluntary sector.

Reference/

Reference has been made to Department of Education Employment List 99 (p535C) as an example of how that type of information is made more widely available, whether it should be made even more widely available and more of it made available is a question I suggest might or would require further detailed consideration if you considered it appropriate.

There are other matters of almost commonsense that have arisen. For example, one that arose this morning and has arisen before, the question of whether one adult should ever be allowed to supervise a group of children in an organised environment on his own.

I appreciate that there are many activities where one adult may be required to give tuition to one child. I'm not really talking about those. I appreciate there are limits to what might be done but there are certain basic commonsense ideas that you might consider worthy of making the subject of recommendation.

One area you may wish to look at fairly closely, however, is the use made of local authority premises. Because of the aura of respectability that appears to be given to an organisation by being in local authority premises, you may consider that because that aura of respectability does appear to be given to such organisations that local authorities may have to accept responsibilities commensurate with the accreditation they appear to coincidentally almost give to such bodies and a number of issues which arise such as monitoring of the operation of the clubs in their premises, the need to interview people prior to letting premises to them, the requirement for parental involvement, committees and constitutions.

Training has been referred, training given by local authorities to leaders of children's groups and how to deal with children. We have heard of some authorities having schemes for accrediting or validating particular organisations by registering that organisation, largely for financial reasons but the registration itself does provide certain other benefits.

I appreciate the matter is somewhat different in relation to premises other than those owned by local authorities. There may well, however, / however, be some controls that could be applied in general to voluntary organisations through the various umbrella organisations that represent them. It may be that consideration could be given to the position of local authorities first with a view to such measures as are also appropriate to voluntary bodies being thereafter adopted by them.

Now, sir, that has simply been an attempt to almost provide a list of issues which have arisen in the evidence and to try to present them in some related pattern. I was going to use the word "coherent" but I accept that the evidence has not been led in the case in three separate sections but we are looking at all the evidence and trying to identify issues which arise under the three headings which you will consider recommendations on.

Obviously you may have questions for me which I shall be happy to deal with or there may be some issues that you consider have been omitted and you may wish to comment on them and I shall be happy to deal with that.

Beyond these submissions, I do not propose to say anything further at this stage. I anticipate that there may be comments made or submissions made by others around the table that I would wish to deal with and I would welcome the opportunity of making any further submissions that are appropriate after everyone else has addressed you. Thank you, sir.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you, Mr. Bonomy. Now, Mr. Campbell.

MR. CAMPBELL: Thank you, sir. Sadly, Scotland has experienced a number of major disasters and tragedies over recent years. That said, there was something uniquely awful about the 13th March of this year. The events of that day still numb the senses of all who remember them and always will. None of us can fully appreciate the devastation of those most directly affected by Hamilton's evil deeds but we all share the outrage and despair at the meaningless loss of 16 young and pure lives, the ruthless murder of their teacher and the serious injuries, both physical and mental, inflicted on their young classmates and the other teachers in the gymnasium./

gymnasium.

Those whom I represent welcome the setting up of this tribunal. It is a very fervent hope that it will lead to immediate and radical reform which will not only increase public safety in our country but will also be a fitting memorial to the victims of Thomas Hamilton.

Sir,/

3.20 p.m.

Sir, with those introductory remarks, I would intend now to outline to you the general order of the submissions which will be presented on behalf of the families and the injured teachers. There will be no attempt to provide you with a resume or summary of the evidence, in accordance with the indication which you gave last week. However, firstly, I will deal with the submissions on gun control reform. Thereafter my learned junior, Miss Dunlop will deal with the events of the 13th March, and she will then go on to provide a summary of some of the evidence as it bears on Hamilton's personality and character.

Thereafter I will deal with the acts and omissions of Central Scotland Police. Thereafter again Miss Dunlop will deal with some submissions relating to the conduct of the Fiscals' Service. Then there will be some concluding remarks.

I turn therefore, Sir, to the recommendations and submissions on the matter of gun control reform. In considering whether Dunblane should provoke Law Reform in the area of gun control, and in assessing the nature and extent of any change, it may be relevant to dwell, however unpalatably, on what might have happened on the 13th March of this year.

This is not in any way to minimise the horror of what did in fact occur. However, we know that Hamilton had enough ammunition and sufficient fire power to kill more or less every adult and child in the school.

There is evidence from which one can infer that he expected to find a school assembly in session when he arrived. Shortly before that he had attempted to cut off the school's telephone lines, presumably to prevent the summoning of help.

He went to the Assembly Hall first. Fortunately it was empty, but only a few minutes earlier it was packed with some 250 children and adults.

Hamilton discharged his first shots in the empty Assembly Hall before making his way to the adjacent/adjacent gymnasium, firing another few rounds while doing so. The carnage in that gymnasium was horrendous, an evil crime of the very worst kind. However, when considering the need for any law reform it is as well to bear in mind that Hamilton might have murdered hundreds of children and their teachers that day. Had he arrived when the Assembly Hall was full, or had he not killed himself when he did, there is no knowing what might have happened.

Sir, 17 dead and many injured is more than bad enough to justify radical change, but these reflections throw into relief the dangers facing society if many of our citizens are armed with weapons designed to kill and designed to kill with rapid and clinical efficiency.

One can recall Mr. McMurdo's evidence that there will be more Hamiltons at large in our society enjoying, if that is the right word, lawful possession of guns. Dunblane will happen again at any time unless decisive action is taken.

It is true that society faces a major problem relating to the use of illegal weapons. However, this should not in my submission provoke a laissez-faire attitude to the dangers from lawfully-held weapons. Illegal weapons are an important issue but they are a quite separate issue.

No doubt there is recognition of the need for tough measures to deal with the supply and the use of illegal guns. Also no doubt severe penalties for illegal possession of guns is both justified and widely acknowledged.

From the perspective of those whom I represent, however, a central and critically important fact is that the victims were murdered and injured by a lawfully-held weapon owned and used by someone sanctioned by the police on several occasions, most recently just over a year before the murders. Inevitably, many of the submissions lodged with the tribunal discuss in detail various options for reform and improvement of the present system of Firearms Control.

No doubt there is room for improvement in many areas, but on behalf of the families I would wish to pose a question: is this a time for tinkering with the present procedures or is/

is it a time for root and branch change?

One may think that the lesson of Hungerford and then Dunblane, and other such tragedies worldwide, is that the time has come for radical reform.

Sir, your recommendations to Parliament are a matter entirely for you, but it is the cry of the families of the dead and injured children and of the injured teachers that never again should we tolerate the possibility of crimes such as this being carried out with lawfully-held weapons. Their aim is that never again should anyone be murdered a lawfully-held weapon, hence the call for a complete ban on the civilian ownership, possession and use of all types of gun.

This call, Sir, is directed in the first instance to yourself, in the context of this Inquiry. It is the primary and most important submission of all those whom I represent.

Many may regard this as the only rational response to what has happened. No doubt some others will reject it as an emotional response to a hard case. However, in the context of gun crime there is no such thing as a hard case, or if there is, every case is a hard case.

My learned friend Mr. Bonomy has outlined a large number of issues which emerge from the evidence, but the primary and most important issue is the extent to which civilians should have guns.

Sir, I now.....

LORD CULLEN: Just before we go on, I wonder if I can be quite clear about that? When you talk about civilians, I take it by that you mean both individual ownership and what I might call Club ownership?

MR. CAMPBELL: Yes, indeed, sir.

Sir, I now propose to deal with a number of facts which in my submission are established in the evidence and which are relevant, in my submission, to the primary submission which I have just/just made. The first of these is as follows: whatever improvements are made to the system of gun control in this country, the potential for another Dunblane will remain. If we are discussing simply improvements to the current firearms system, any new system will still rely to a very large extent upon human judgment and discretion, the adequacy or otherwise of enquiries and investigations, the reliability of references, the honesty and good character of applicants, etc., etc.

However, mistakes will occur, and even though the most thorough safeguards are put in place they will not, and cannot, remove the risk of another tragedy caused by lawfully-held weapons.

Mr. McMurdo affirmed his view that no system could guarantee public safety from undesirables possessing guns under a Firearms Certificate, no system could be foolproof. (Day 12, Page 1552).

Similarly, the Green Book, as I will call the submission on this area presented on behalf of the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Home Secretary -- the Green Book at Page 17, Paragraph 8.4, states "There are no licensing arrangements which could give an absolute guarantee that no legitimate gun owner will ever misuse his gun".

Secondly, Sir, there will always be a conflict or a tension between limited resources, on the one hand -- that is limited both in terms of money and manpower -- and on the other hand a rigorous and effective system of control.

Whatever the immediate impact of Dunblane, will the passage of time dim the memory? As after Hungerford, in due course will "administrative efficiency", to use Mr. Cameron's description of it, drive Government thinking?

Recent examples of this are the move towards postal renewals of firearms certificates and the proposed abolition of the countersignatory requirement which was introduced in the wake of Hungerford.

Sir, so long as the present system remains unchanged in its fundamentals the lesson of history/history may be that in due course the memory of Dunblane will fade and other considerations will gradually but inevitably predominate. In my submission this is a cogent factor in favour of radical change now.

Thirdly, Sir, there is also a tension between on the one hand a police force seeking to regulate the shooting community, and on the other hand a police force under pressure to provide a good service to the same people.

Reference has been made in the evidence to what has been described as the Thematic Inspection, and Chief Inspector Robertson agreed in my cross-examination of him that this document read much like a Marks & Spencers' promotional feature designed to please the consumers of the service. And I noted that Mr. Penn in this context referred to the term "police service" not "police force".

Sir, so long as we licence shooters, can we be certain that public safety will always be the paramount consideration? The answer is "No, we can't be certain that public safety will always be the paramount consideration".

Fourthly, even if the new system is as good as can be, and even if no one makes any mistakes in operating it, the potential will nonetheless remain for an individual's circumstances to change, creating danger where none existed before -- for example, the onset of mental disorder, or unforeseen situational factors of the kind described by Professor Cooke -- a decision to commit suicide, or perhaps a decision to carry out an extended suicide.

We know from the evidence that there is no medical or psychological test which can predict such behaviour with certainty and thereby minimise the risk. Here I can refer to the evidence of Professor Cooke and Mr. Morris of the British Medical Association.

Thus, for example, we may find ourselves in a situation where we watch our neighbour's personality and character change out of all recognition either due to illness, bereavement, domestic or employment upheavals, or whatever. We may/may see him become an unstable or violent man. However, we may never know until it is too late that he possesses in his home a mini-arsenal of firearms.

When our gun law was developed it was the context of a society where the civilian use of guns was limited to gamekeepers, game and bird shooting, pest control and the like. It may be that the laws were not designed to cope with the present relatively large number of urban residents who possess several semi-automatic handguns in our midst for no reason other than shooting at targets. It might be that we have found ourselves in this situation almost by accident, or at least without any fundamental review of the current position. Whatever else, this is the opportunity for that fundamental review. The tragedy is that it required not only Hungerford, but also Dunblane, to prompt it.

Fifthly, Sir, and looking to the future, if we assume no fundamental change, the continued institution of gun Clubs and the availability of guns through a licensing system, will continue to introduce many thousands of people over the years to guns -- people who otherwise would never become familiar with guns and their use.

Not all those users will be of the impeccable character and trustworthiness of someone such as Mr. Penn. Some, perhaps many, will be attracted by the guns themselves and the supposed glamour or ego boost derived from them. Therefore another benefit in the longrun of fundamental reform is to take away that opportunity for familiarity in the future.

Sixthly, Sir, there is an apparently reasonably-well established link between, on the one hand, access to guns, and on the other the rates of gun crime and gun suicide.

Professor Cooke spoke to this matter in some detail in his evidence under reference, among others, to the Vancouver and Seattle studies and to the Washington D.C. study.

Similarly, one can find a discussion of this in the Green Book at Part 1, Paragraphs 13 to 18, and at annexe G, and in the submission recently lodged/lodged by Professor Gabor, the criminologist from Ottawa University.

The message is that the fewer guns in society then the less gun crime and the less gun suicide there will be.

Interestingly, the studies also demonstrate the absence of what is sometimes referred to as a displacement effect -- in other words, people deprived of guns do not turn to other weapons, and achieve murders or killing with these.

Professor Cooke agreed that the availability of guns was the most important situational factor in gun crime and gun suicide.

It may be no more than common sense, but an obvious step to reduce the risk of another Dunblane is to remove the lawful ready availability of guns.

May I move on to, just a few general observations, but still in this same overall context? Firstly, in my respectful submission the debate should not be influenced by any notion of a presumption that individuals have a right to own or to use guns, nor by concepts such as civil liberties or freedom of the individual.

There is no inherent right to own, possess or use a gun in our law or constitution. If there is to be an overriding or paramount consideration, it may be that few would doubt that it should be public safety. The right to life is a fundamental right in the laws and constitutions of all developed nations.

And/

3.40 p.m.

And if a safety-first philosophy, which has been discussed in the evidence from time to time, is to be adopted it leads naturally to radical change of the nature sought by the families and the injured teachers.

Secondly, sir, any decision to continue to permit lawful possession of firearms necessarily implies a willingness to tolerate an increased rate of gun crime and gun suicides. It also necessarily implies a willingness to tolerate that the risk of another Dunblane will continue.

Thirdly, sir, it may be thought that the shooting community do themselves few favours by their apparent reluctance to countenance any material change. The evidence is full of examples of this attitude and general approach. For example, the insistence that any restriction on the types of target shooting available to the shooting community would be unacceptable, and that again for example restriction to single shot .22 pistols would devastate the sport and render it more or less devoid of any attraction or meaning. Similarly, the desire to be able to keep ammunition and guns at home; the resistance to any prohibition on manufacturing ammunition at home rather than at the club.

Emphasis has been placed upon the speed of re-loading a single shooter, or at least the potential speed of re-loading a single shooter. No doubt that was done with a view to heading off a prohibition on handguns, but this equiperation of single shot and semi-automatic weapons may have the opposite effect.

We have had some insight into some gun clubs and some members of some gun clubs. It is likely that the clubs and the members of the clubs will vary widely in both their character and the activity carried on therein. No doubt many clubs are excellent and well organised, and no doubt most members are solid, dependable citizens: but it is quite another thing to devolve any responsibility for gun control to the clubs. Such a system would only be as strong as its weakest link. How many weak links there may be we cannot tell, of course, nor/nor can we assess how weak the weakest link would be.

As a matter of small detail, one example of this might be, perhaps, the evidence that a gentleman was allowed to be the range officer at the Callander Club during his probationary period. Now, Mr. McCarthy could not envisage that such a thing would ever happen.

Sir, moving on from those general observations, if I may dwell for a moment or two upon the green book, of which I trust you have a copy, so far as the green book is concerned, it is difficult to know what the status of this document is or should be. No one has spoken to it or explained its terms.

LORD CULLEN: It is called evidence, and it has been accepted as evidence, so it is before me, like everything else, for what it is worth.

MR. CAMPBELL: It does bear to be evidence by the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Scotland. Nonetheless, I presume it is not in any way intended to inhibit or restrict the Tribunal; thus I consider it appropriate to make a few comments on some parts of it.

Sir, on page 3 at the very beginning it talks of "Firearms controls in Great Britain are among the strictest in Europe and indeed the World". Now, it is difficult to know what to make of this comment, in the absence of comparative material; but if true, in my submission it should not encourage complacency and self-congratulation in the light of not just Dunblane and Hungerford but also the correlation between gun availability and gun crime and suicide.

The section at paragraphs 65 to 67 at page 13 is in my submission worthy of comment. Paragraph 65, under the heading of "Personal Suitability" states: "In cases where the prohibition under Section 21 does not apply, the chief officer must decide on the circumstances of the case whether an applicant with a criminal record should be granted a certificate. The Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 does not apply to/

to applications for firearm certificates, and a person applying for a certificate must declare any conviction by a court at home or abroad, however old or minor". Surely the same applies even if an applicant has no criminal record, namely that the chief officer must decide on all aspects of personal suitability, on all aspects of the case.

This passage proceeds "The police are sometimes required to make delicate decisions about issuing firearm certificates to people who have criminal records or to people who are thought to have, or to have had, criminal associates but have no conviction. More difficult than these can be cases in which the individual is thought to be suffering from mental disorder of some kind, especially ones in which there is no formal indication of it (for instance, no admissions to a mental hospital or other medical evidence). The Government does not give the police central guidance about circumstances of that kind. It is up to chief officers to exercise their statutory discretion. An applicant who is dissatisfied with the police decision can take the matter to appeal, or seek judicial review of it".

Sir, it may be thought the area of personal suitability is one of the areas in most need of clear guidance as to how to go about an investigation of the matter. What is disturbing about this passage is the total concentration upon applicants who have a criminal record or who have criminal associates or who have a mental disorder.

The passage which I require to deal with perhaps most directly, given the submission I make on behalf of those whom I represent, is a relatively short passage at the beginning of Part II of the document at page 17, where the authors discuss the proposed reform and a complete prohibition on the possession and use of guns. I won't read it out, because we can read it for ourselves.

Sir, this Section does appear on the face of it to completely ignore the category of person who kills or who commits suicide, possibly even an extended suicide, using lawfully-held guns, but who nonetheless is a person who would probably not have done this if guns were not readily available. Hamilton in my submission was such a person/person. Here I refer to the evidence of Mr. Joseph Jackson and also Dr. Baird regarding the matter of extended suicide. The Washington DC, the Vancouver and the Seattle evidence spoken to by Professor Cook is clear evidence that such people do indeed exist.

From all we know of Hamilton it seems inherently unlikely that if guns had been removed from him at an earlier stage that he would have nonetheless armed himself with revolvers and semi-automatic handguns. One may think that whether this was or was not a planned extended suicide, whether this was or was not a planned spree killing with a subsequent decision to commit suicide, it was the ready availability of those guns and ammunition to Hamilton which, coupled with the opportunity to use them in clubs in Central Scotland and thereabouts, particularly in early 1996, which inspired and cultivated the evil idea.

Sir, this passage on page 17 and the top of page 18 of the green book also ignores the fact that if a complete prohibition of this nature had been in place for example by 1970 and thereafter, it is likely that Hamilton would never have become interested in and familiar with guns in the first place. A long-term view is necessary and justified. It is as important to stop another tragedy in 20 years' time as it is to stop another such tragedy next year.

This section of the green book also ignores the long-term benefits of reducing over time the demand and thus the supply of guns, and the desirability of taking all practical steps to prevent the gun culture, before the number of guns in our society makes it difficult if not impossible to reverse the process.

This passage in the green book ignores or hardly addresses the benefits of a complete prohibition. The only nod in this direction is one sentence at paragraph 8.2, which says "The aim would be to minimise the number of lethal weapons in circulation". It is not even conceded that a ban would achieve this, but surely this is unarguable, unless we assume that all current firearm certificate holders would immediately find a way to break the law.

This/

This passage ignores the logical result of the Seattle, Vancouver and Washington DC research that I mentioned earlier in my submission. This is also commented upon in Professor Gabor's submission and by Professor Cook in his evidence and also in the green book, in another passage.

This section of the green book appears on the face of it to emphasise that if you have a determined criminal he will still find a way to obtain a gun for use in criminal activity. What is one to make of this apparent emphasis? Is it that so long as a total absence of correlation of activity cannot be achieved nothing can be done? Surely this is not the intended effect or impression? Presumably we can assume that the Government is determined to tackle the problem of illegally held guns with determination and that the Government will be keen to consider severe penalties for illegal possession or use of guns?

What about impulsive gun crime, suicide and the Hamiltons of this world, who are not of the criminal underworld, with access to guns? It is in my submission of some importance to remember that Hungerford, Tasmania and Dunblane were all murders carried out by persons with lawful possession of guns. There is no evidence that the criminal world are spree killers.

In the same passage in the green book reference is made to the economic benefits derived from the activities of the shooting committee. It states "These are considerable". No reference is made to the cost in terms of human costs, emotional, social and economic costs from gun crime and gun suicide. One assumes it would be readily accepted that no economic benefit outweighs the loss of even one of the young lives at Dunblane, that no economic benefit outweighs the benefits which could be derived from a reduction in gun crime and gun suicide, and not against the benefits which could be derived from the prevention of another Dunblane.

As to the recreational benefits of shooting, again one doubts if it would be suggested that these outweigh the benefits of public safety and public reassurance. Fortunately there are a wide variety of alternative leisure pursuits available for those who currently shoot for fun.

It/

It may even be possible to design non-lethal forms of target shooting. I think some of the documentation makes reference to such things as laser or computer-generated or Virtual Reality material.

At/

4 p.m.

At the very least, the kind of reform proposed would provide the necessary impetus for such activities to be developed if there was a demand for them.

Reference is also made in this section of the green book to occupational requirements. Plainly, that is a more serious matter. Any exemptions would be a matter for Government to consider. If there were to be any exemptions it would be important that these were not so extensive as to defeat the aim of the legislative reform. It would be for Government to consider whether exemptions for occupational reasons were necessary and justified in the light of any case made out by, for example, vets and farmers.

LORD CULLEN: So what you say about civilians is subject to that qualification, is that right?

MR. CAMPBELL: No, sir, no it is not. I make no concession in that regard.

LORD CULLEN: I was not suggesting a concession but you accept there may be a case which maybe made out for certain occupational uses, is that right?

MR. CAMPBELL: I am accepting that that is a matter which will no doubt require to be given careful consideration by the Government and by you, sir, but I don't intend to dilute in any way the main message of those whom I represent.

Sir, consideration of whether or not any exemptions were justified would, in my submission, require to take place on the basis of a careful investigation as to whether or not alternative methods which would carry out the required task were available. For example, slaughter instruments other than firearms for vets and the like and also careful consideration of whether, if exemptions were to be made, acceptable methods of control could be devised. For example, access to guns from the police for a specified purpose for a limited period. For example, for the culling of foxes or vermin or whatever was required.

Sir,/

Sir, I therefore turn to my concluding remarks on this chapter, if I may. As indicated earlier, those whom I represent wish to see radical reform. They call for the banning of civilian ownership or possession and use of all types of gun. Within that overall aim, and without wishing to dilute the main message, some of the families would identify certain steps as matters of urgent and immediate priority.

Chief amongst these is the removal of handguns from civilian use. The Inquiry has heard evidence as to the concealability of handguns. Further, even a single shot pistol can be reloaded quickly in experienced hands. However, there is no denying the particular lethality of semi-automatic pistols and of revolvers. These weapons are devoid of social utility. They are used by a tiny minority of the population. No doubt some of those indulge in genuine competition but for many, Hamilton included, it amounts to no more than the enjoyment of using these types of weapons.

The retention of single shot .22 calibre pistols stored and secured in a centralised facility is recommended by some organisations in the submissions before you, sir. However, we have been told that without semi-automatic handguns, target shooting as an activity would hardly survive. Further, it is clear that centralised storage is not without its problems, problems emphasised by shooters who appear to be determined to retain residential possession.

Further, it is obvious that even a single shot .22 calibre pistol can kill and can kill numbers of people within a short time. Hence, for example, the English Police Federation see no logic in the removal of arbitrary exemptions for these types of weapons. Indeed, one of the submissions I think makes the point that the capacity of the firearm is somewhat irrelevant when only one person is armed. The result, sir, is that without prejudice to the primary submission that all guns should be banned, if this is rejected, the families seek as an urgent and minimum step the immediate banning of the civilian use of handguns. That said, they see no obvious reason to exclude rifles and also shotguns from the necessary legislation.

The/

The only obvious distinction between handguns and rifles in this context is that the latter are less easy to conceal and that automatic and semi-automatic rifles are already prohibited. However, rifles can kill and kill as effectively as other weapons and the same comment applies to shotguns, now the most common weapon used in organised crime.

It is true that Hamilton used a firearm, not a shotgun, but the critical issue is not merely the use by Hamilton of a lawfully held firearm but more the general use by Hamilton of a lawfully held gun. The families and the injured teachers see no real distinction in this regard.

If, however, for whatever reason it is considered inappropriate to ban shotguns, the option nonetheless remains to prohibit firearms, now a well recognised category of weapon.

That said, I would wish to end this chapter as I began, that it is the families' plea that the deaths and injuries of their children be not in vain and that in future Government will act to remove the potential for murder by the use of guns lawfully held under a civilian firearms licensing system.

Sir, that concludes what I wish to say in that context. The next chapter in the submissions on behalf of the families will be delivered by my learned junior, Miss Dunlop.

LORD CULLEN: Yes, Miss Dunlop, perhaps you could make a start on that.

MISS DUNLOP: Yes, sir. It will have been apparent from questioning on behalf of the families in the early days of the Inquiry that there are points to be made in relation to the police handling of the immediate aftermath of the tragedy.

The families note also the police view that there are lessons to be learned and that there is an aim to produce written guidance (p135 and p141). The sudden and terrible events with which the police and other emergency services had to deal on the 13th March clearly affected the officers personally and no one can deny that there were strategic/strategic and practical difficulties.

Nevertheless, it is hoped that the following points can be accepted or if not accepted by all parties, at least respected. The points I would make are six in number. Firstly, it was suggested that the congregation of relatives was an unusual feature of this tragedy. It does not seem unprecedented or unforeseeable that relatives hearing of a disaster will gather as close as they can to the scene. As a general principle therefore, high priority should be given to informing relatives as quickly as possible of what has happened to their loved ones.

Secondly, whilst such matters as erecting cordons and appointing a productions officer are important, the early designation of officers to the task of gathering information and passing it on to families would perhaps prevent the problem which occurred here of the media being able to tell the rest of the country what had occurred, with the families within the school being deprived of news. (p109, 118, 129 and 221).

Thirdly, it is clearly desirable that onlookers, particularly members of the Press, be kept at a distance from those in distress and waiting for news.

Fourthly, a considerable delay elapsed before the parents of injured children were given information and a longer time before the bereaved parents were given their news. Perhaps the length of the delay for each family is not as important as the fact that on any view they had to wait several hours for news. There was no consolation in that news but it is a form of torture to be kept waiting in the knowledge that something terrible has happened without having details of what or to whom.

Difficulties in communication by telephone and radio with Stirling have been mentioned and technical solutions to such potential problems in the future may require to be explored. It might, however, have been possible to send a radio message asking an officer to bring information from the hospital in Stirling to the school or to despatch an officer to the hospital to ascertain the position or simply to find another telephone locally./

locally.

Fifthly, the decision not to release any information until a complete picture has been assembled may be questioned where the identity of some victims has been established relatively early. Apart from confusion between two children, identification was complete by 12.04 p.m. (p 113). It is particularly unfortunate that the parents of the injured children were not able to be with them in these first few hours. The families are glad to note the concession by Chief Superintendent Ogg (p 118) that the names of injured children could have been noted as they left in ambulances.

Finally, the request of the families that a more senior officer than the officers with whom they were dealing came and spoke to them should not have been denied, particularly when the most senior officer in the Force was present. The manner in which those under stress and asking questions are spoken to should be as sensitive as possible. It should be noted, however, that the parents greatly appreciated the sensitivity and support of the members of the support teams allocated to each of them at that time.

That concludes that chapter, sir. Perhaps in rather a shorter time than anticipated.

LORD CULLEN: Yes, perhaps it was. Now, Mr. Campbell, you are to speak next, is that right, on another aspect?

MR. CAMPBELL: No, next will be Miss Dunlop dealing with certain evidence relating to Hamilton.

LORD CULLEN: That is right. Will this take some time and is this a convenient point at which to break off?

MISS DUNLOP: Yes, this is a more lengthy part, sir, and it may be better dealt with tomorrow.

LORD CULLEN: Yes, I think it might be best if we break now and resume at 10 o'clock tomorrow. Thank you.

TUESDAY, 9th JULY, 1996.

TWENTY-FIFTH DAY.

MISS DUNLOP: Before proceeding to the next part of my submissions if I could just make one final point in relation to what was said yesterday about the events of 13th March: as I said yesterday, the support of the support teams has been much appreciated by the families, but it may be observed that the main priority of the families on 13th March was to receive news and that time spent putting together the support teams at that stage appears to have delayed the imparting of that news. So that whilst the assembling of the support teams in the aftermath was important it is not as important as the receipt of news.

If I can move on to make some remarks on the life and character of Thomas Hamilton. A considerable amount of information has been assembled about Thomas Hamilton and about his life, especially from the age of 16. The only employment he ever held was with Stirling Burgh Council and this he gave up within about three years and ran a woodcraft and do it yourself shop. There has been suggestions that the business failed and that Hamilton himself attributed this also to rumours in the community, although it seems to have been more likely that it was due to competition, and the reference to that is Councillor Ball at page 1953. Doubt is also cast on his commitment to save the shop by his grandfather and others who said that all he really wanted to do was to run boys clubs. The clubs were used as a source of boys for his camps as described by the witness McGregor at page 1997 as even more important to him. That the running of such clubs and more particularly camps was one of his main interests in life is not in doubt.

Turning then to look at Hamilton's shooting history: he was a member of a rifle club at the age of 16 and he graduated to full bore shooting thinking that .22 was cissy, the reference to that is at pages 360 and 372 in Mr. Moffat's evidence. His shooting patterns were unusual, in particular he had his own targets with fluorescent stickers on part of the body. He took these targets/targets and pinned them up at home. At the gun clubs he did not follow a course of firing, being interested really in firing off his bullets as quickly as possible. He did not take part in competitions. There is evidence about his interest in the Hungerford massacre and his liking for violent films. His guns were his friends. There were times when he brought together his two main interests in his life, by taking young boys to shoot or showing guns to children.

Turning next to look at his paedophilia: he was described in the evidence by Dr. Fairgrieve, by now Chief Inspector Hughes, by Dr. Baird and Professor Cook as a paedophile. He was constantly engaged in recruiting boys for his clubs and camps, and it is clear from the oral evidence and from his circulars that he pressed for club members to come away to camps. These were camps often in isolated locations where he could have unimpeded access to young boys, scantily clad, performing particular movements which he could record on film or video and watch at home, camps where he would have them rub suntan oil into his body and he could have his favourite boys sleep beside him.

He was adept at defending himself. You have the evidence of Mrs. Deuchar and Mrs. Ogilvie about burning material in his garden. He denied the existence of certain photographs in particular to the then Detective Sergeant Hughes and he often used attack as defence. He engaged in a great deal of self justification, one particularly notable moment being sending a pair of trunks to Central Regional Council. He was responsible for a barrage of correspondence not only denying in fact negative connotations but also stressing the value of his work. That there was a gap between his perception of his activities and the beliefs of the majority of others is apparent from references in the evidence to his delusions of grandeur (Dr. Fairgrieve page 425) and Mr. McMurdo referred to his lack of perception at page 1679 and the fact he considered himself to be persecuted.

His paedophilia seems to have been overt, and there are two pieces of evidence in relation to that, firstly from the witness Carruthers and secondly from the anonymous witness.

Turning/

Turning to look at his treatment of children: he exposed children to discomfort and at times danger. This was irresponsibility although there is reason to believe that it was deliberate and part of a regime. The physical welfare of boys in his care was jeopardised by over-strenuous exercise and by being taken in boats which had an inadequate supply of life jackets, by being pitched into the waters of Loch Lomond ostensibly to practice self-sufficiency. The boys were kept cold, with insufficient clothing, and were left to play with no supervision.

He was also careless about their emotional welfare. There was evidence of boys being upset and homesick and of bullying tactics by Hamilton. He denied them contact with home and refused to allow them to go back, and in the videos the boys often looked frightened.

It has been said in evidence, particularly by Dr. Baird and by Mr. McFarlane at page 1994 that he used power over boys.

He was deceitful in relation to his activities with boys. He appears to have misrepresented the circumstances of his leaving the schools. In relation to incidents in Aviemore and on Inchmoan Island he certainly made assertions to Mrs. Deuchars that he had been let down by other people although in particular from the evidence of Mrs. Deuchars it is apparent it was not so.

He engaged in deception of childrens' parents regarding his intended activity, and such matters as the reasons for children dressing in particular ways and the need for them to change in front of him in the gymnasium. He made untruthful allegations regarding the police evidence. He misrepresented the existence and membership of his committees and the number of helpers who would be joining him at the camps and other activities. He over-stated his qualifications. He implied that he had approval or support from the local authority or from other individuals, and you have the evidence of Inspector Mill and.....

LORD CULLEN: One point there about his qualifications. Just so that I can be clear, you say he over-stated his qualifications. Is that in some publicity/publicity material?

MISS DUNLOP: He described himself to particular individuals, for example Mr. Moffat, as a gym teacher. He referred to himself as having qualifications in gymnastics when the evidence discloses in fact the only qualification he'd had was that of an assistant coach and.....

LORD CULLEN: Under supervision.

MISS DUNLOP: Under supervision of adult females.

He was also dishonest about other conduct. One notes that his Social Security benefit was terminated for working and that he mis-stated the amount he was charging the boys to benefit from reduced hire charges (page 2061). He appears to have adopted ruses to obtain discounts for camera and gun equipment. He distorted the facts in complaints he made and could reasonably be described as a manipulative liar.

His relationships with adults were generally unsuccessful. He was cruel to his family and in particular to Mrs. Watt and Mr. Hamilton senior. He was tedious with others who were prepared to entertain him. Dr. Baird offered the description "empty" which may be what was meant by other witnesses who described him as boring and uninteresting. He was seen as weird, as a loner, a creep, a misfit. He was described by Professor Cook and Dr. Baird as having no empathy. As well as lack of positive interaction with others there is lack of appropriate negative response. Several witnesses commented particularly on his calmness, and I am thinking here of his grandfather, Mrs. Butterwick, Mr. Holden, Mr. Hughes and Mr. George Robertson, although some of those witnesses, particularly Mr. Hughes and George Robertson, also got the impression of suppressed anger.

There is the question of the extent to which the events of 13th March were planned. There is evidence of his having quizzed a small boy about arrangements at Dunblane Primary School and he stockpiled ammunition but it may be thought that there was a degree of compulsiveness about the location. The evidence in this area is perhaps in some/some respects contradictory. There is evidence from the witness McGregor (page 2001) about the statement about never having to pay for shirts.

There is, on the other hand, evidence that he attempted to pay for the hired van in advance and from the witness Gillies at page 259 which may be thought to cast some doubt on that view he had he could benefit in some way financially by never having to pay for things by events which he was planning within the next few days. It is difficult in fact to make much of the evidence about the shirts given that there was in fact the purchase of new shirts at all.

There is also evidence of his having booked the school for the Easter camp (page 2077) in the evidence of Mr. Mercer, although to a degree that may be, the actual date may be slightly confused given his revision which he indicated yesterday, but there is evidence of his attempt to book the minibus for the 14th and 19th March.

In conclusion, it has been suggested by at least one shooting group that society has some responsibility for what occurred because of the way it treated Hamilton. It is probably right to consider this suggestion but in my submission it does not stand up to scrutiny. The urge of parents to protect their children is utterly fundamental and the protection of children as a whole underpins our legislation and decision making in many areas of life.

Such censure of Hamilton which did occur and the limited restrictions of his activities which took place were because he was perceived, and rightly perceived, as a threat to children. He should not have been allowed free and sole charge of young children wherever and whenever he wanted to do whatever he wanted especially when he would not acknowledge that there was anything wrong with his methods let alone his motivation. It has emerged from the evidence that society should have interfered more with his sinister activities, not less, and that would not have allowed better integration or status for Hamilton in the community.

MR. CAMPBELL: Sir, I now intend to return to the evidence as it bears upon the conduct of Central Scotland Police. I would perhaps at the/

the outset begin with a brief summary of the main effects of my submissions in this regard.

Sir, Central Scotland Police were charged with the responsibility of determining in advance of granting or renewing Hamilton's firearm application whether there was reason to believe that he was for any reason unfit to be entrusted with weapons. This is a summary of the reference to Section 27 of the Act. This was a judicial or quasi judicial responsibility which required careful consideration of all known facts. That careful consideration required to be followed by an evaluation of Hamilton's character and his trustworthiness. Such an evaluation was a consideration of the implications, if any, which may arise as to whether Hamilton was deserving of trust in respect of possession of deadly weapons.

In addition, Section 27 necessarily requires a system of inquiry and information-gathering which would be designed to facilitate such procedures.

LORD CULLEN: I just want to be quite clear about that. Do you say that the proviso to Section 27(1) means that the police force have a responsibility to find out, make enquiry to find out whether the applicant is of intemperate habits or unsound mind.

MR. CAMPBELL: Or otherwise it would.....

LORD CULLEN: Let's deal with one thing at a time. Is that right? You say that is what they should be enquiring into and after that they should be responsible also for considering whether a person is unfit to be entrusted for some other reason?

MR. CAMPBELL: Yes indeed, sir.

LORD CULLEN: That imposes an obligation, a responsibility for enquiring into the sanity of the person who is applying; is that right. I want to be quite clear about your position on this because there are three heads to it. I can quite understand your concerns about the third, but I am not quite sure about the first and second. You say/say it is irrespective of a grant to a person in respect of whom the Chief Officer of Police has reason to believe certain things. Now, I appreciate there may be some concern as to what extent that saddles the police with responsibility of continued investigation but I would like to understand really what your standpoint is about what this section actually means.

MR. CAMPBELL: Well, I think in the context.....

LORD CULLEN: It may be the way it is phrased but I would like to know what your position is. The responsibility for investigating what? Is it all three heads or is it less, something less than that?

MR. CAMPBELL: I would approach the matter on the basis that Parliament entrusted the police with -- moving away just for the moment from the precise terms of the provision -- Parliament has recognised the particular danger which flows from the possession of firearms and this is something which requires no elaboration.

It/

10.20 a.m.

It has entrusted the Chief Officer of Police with the responsibility of that licensing system. It has told the Chief Officer of Police not to grant a licence if there is reason to believe certain matters. In my submission, by necessary implication there is therefore a responsibility on the police to enquire and investigate.

LORD CULLEN: Of course, the regulations which underpin this are designed to provide certain information to the Chief Officer of Police: but you are saying it is not enough to rely on that input of information which comes through in compliance with the regulations, but there is some responsibility to see if there is anything amiss in respect of any of these three; is that your position?

MR. CAMPBELL: That is my position. There is the additional factor that once the information is ingathered, by whatever means, the responsibility is to assess it, evaluate it and apply one's mind to any implications which may arise.

LORD CULLEN: Yes. "Having reason to believe" means you have to assess the significance and value of what you know.

MR. CAMPBELL: Particularly in the light of -- in my submission it is important to notice the weight is put in the legislation "...any reason unfitted to be entrusted": so trust, character, suitability are the very essence of the exercise.

LORD CULLEN: There is another aspect. I don't know if you have a submission on this or not. I find the construction of provisions like that quite hard to follow, because the main part of Section 27(1) is concerned with the matters in relation to which positively the Chief Officer has to be satisfied. The second branch is "...should be admitted to have in his possession with danger to the public or to the peace", and then we have added on to this this proviso. Now, there may be areas where there is an overlap between these two expressions, and there may be areas where they do not/not overlap, and if you have any submissions about what is implied by lack of fitness to be entrusted I would like to hear what you have to say. Does it go beyond matters of concern for safety, does it go beyond concern for the public peace, does it go into other areas? We did explore this to some extent in the evidence.

MR. CAMPBELL: Indeed. My understanding of this - I would readily accept that the provision is not entirely clear, but while there may be an overlap in certain areas there may be other areas where there is perhaps less of an overlap. One obvious context of the first part of the provision -- if for example we related to the storage facilities available for the weapons and also the extent, the use to which they might be put.....

LORD CULLEN: Quite so. There are however many things, not only dealing with firearms but also shotguns, concerning the behaviour of the person, whether that behaviour does or does not give rise to concern about public safety or peace.

MR. CAMPBELL: Yes.

LORD CULLEN: If we recognise that, one might ask if we get to "Unfitted to be entrusted" what are we talking about now?

MR. CAMPBELL: I recall some questions you asked of Mr. McMurdo, where you asked him whether this provision involved any responsibilities.

LORD CULLEN: It was that kind of problem that was bothering me at the time.

MR. CAMPBELL: What the legislation is asking the police to do is consider: is this a man whose character would permit a reasonable degree of trust not only in relation to public safety but in relation to such matters as honesty and fair dealing, because this is essentially a preventative provision, recognising it would not always be possible to predict everything which may occur in the future. So it is a safety-first philosophy.

LORD CULLEN: That I can understand. The/

The only other point I would draw to your attention is that the company it keeps is people of unsound mind, people with intemperate habits, which seems to indicate something of a fundamental nature which indicates they are not safe to be entrusted; in other words, there is a "catch all" provision, which must imply some sign of a person's fitness.

It may be much more general than just danger to the public, safety and to the peace. I am still uncertain, however, what the scope of this expression "Unfitted to be entrusted" is to be.

MR. CAMPBELL: It is focusing not so much on a prediction or a foreseeability that there will be danger to the public safety or peace; the focus must be on the character of the person.

LORD CULLEN: But it must be with some eye to what the object of the legislation is. It may be it goes more generally into the responsibility of someone to whom a certificate is entrusted.

MR. CAMPBELL: Yes.

LORD CULLEN: And that has a number of aspects, which I was trying to explore with Mr. McMurdo.

MR. CAMPBELL: Indeed. Sir, in my submission the evidence indicates that no one in the Firearms Department of Central Scotland Police ever closely applied their mind to the question of Hamilton's personal fitness in the sense required by Section 27. I might add there as well, no one applied their minds at the relevant time to the test required in a slightly different form in Section 30.

The only officer who did address the issue was an officer in the Child Protection Unit, Detective Sergeant Hughes. Although he had no direct responsibility for firearms, after a review of the results of his investigations in 1991 he formed the judgment that Hamilton was not a suitable person to be entrusted with a firearm. Given the known facts at this time, in my submission this judgment was clearly correct, and it is hard to countenance how any reasonable criticism of it can be mounted.

Even/

Even if one confines attention to Hughes' warning that Hamilton was a risk to children, a combination of this risk with the possession of weapons was surely stark and conspicuous. Of course, the terms of the memo went well beyond this simple message.

However, sir, we know that Hughes' recommendation was summarily dismissed, and Hughes' considered opinion is now categorised in a somewhat pejorative way as a "gut feeling". Whether one calls it a gut feeling or not, in my submission Hughes' conclusion and the process which created it was exactly what was required of Central Scotland Police under the legislation. If only Mr. McMurdo or someone else in the Firearms Department had done something similar it is hard to escape the conclusion that they would have been bound to reject the idea of trusting Hamilton with anything of any seriousness let alone entrusting him with these deadly weapons.

However, the evidence indicates that this was not the way in which the Firearms Department operated. The lack of a serious criminal conviction on Hamilton's record and the refusal of the Procurator Fiscal to prosecute killed Hughes' initiative at birth.

No one even considered it worthwhile to speak to Mr. Hughes. Mr. McMurdo did not think at any stage throughout the whole history of the matter to consult Hamilton's firearms file until after the 13th March, although one can note in parenthesis that if he had consulted it he would have found nothing to help us in that. Instead, Mr. McMurdo proceeded on the basis of a recommendation from the Divisional Commander, who had read Hughes' memo, and made a recommendation without even having met Hamilton. An extraordinarily narrow and legalistic, albeit administratively convenient, definition of "personal unfitness" prevented any serious scrutiny of the decisions required by both sections 27 and 30. One can be reasonably confident throughout this, because had there been any serious consideration of Hamilton's full circumstances the enquiring officer would surely have noticed that.

It is not surprising and no coincidence that/that Hughes came from another unit, perhaps one more used to sceptical and enquiring police work and more experienced in independent valuation and judgment. That said, his recommendation was supported at the time by Detective Chief Inspector Holden, although Mr. Holden is now back-tracking on that position.

Thereafter, Hamilton's 1992 and 1995 applications for renewal of his Firearms Certificate proceeded as matters of pure routine. Even when WPC Anderson tried to sound the alarm in 1995 it was crushed by the unwillingness of the Department to make an independent judgment or take on board the responsibility entrusted to it by Parliament. So long as the Fiscals remained disinterested the Firearms Department would send up the forms for signing as a matter of pure administration along with the other 30 to 40 per week. It may be thought inevitable such a slack and complacent system would lead to real harm. Fortunately, Dunblanes are extremely rare events; but no one did or could have predicted the full horror of what happened on the 13th March.

It is not, however, the exercise of hindsight to say that Hamilton should have been identified as unstable well before the 13th March. Mr. Hughes and Mr. Holden had done so. The legislation enjoined the Chief Officer or his delegate to identify the potential for danger before it happened. Good reasons for revocation or refusal abounded. Very sadly, it is reasonably clear they were ignored. But for the Firearms Department's collective failure to remove weapons from Hamilton this terrible tragedy would not have occurred.

The overall system, such as it was, was riddled with defects and inadequacies. For example, reference can be made to Mr. Richardson's damning report. Many of these will have played a contributory role, but in the above brief comments I have attempted to identify the essential failure. With that summary, sir, I now seek to elaborate upon them even more.

At the outset, it is right to acknowledge that no organisation or person involved in the history of this matter carries anything like the same degree of blame worthiness and responsibility/responsibility for this terrible event as that borne by Thomas Hamilton.

That said, the relevant legislation placed a solemn and heavy responsibility upon the Chief Officer of Central Scotland Police in granting Firearms Certificates only to persons about whom there was no reason to believe they were unfitted to be entrusted with a firearm.

The jurisdiction granted has been described judicially as a branch of preventative justice in the exercise in which Chief Officers are envisaged carrying it out, with additional discretionary powers for the maintenance of order and the preservation of the public peace. That is a reference to the case of AKERS v. TAYLOR 1964 1 Weekly Law Reports Page 415 and 410, discussed at Paragraph 10 of Mr. Carter Manning's opinion of 17th June, 1964.

The reason for this is not difficult to understand. All guns are lethal weapons; they are designed to kill. They grant the possessor a unique ability to cause fatal injury. If used, they are more likely to kill than any other readily-available weapon. Especially, but not uniquely, automatic and semi-automatic weapons have the capacity to kill large numbers of people in a very short period.

Sir, killing can be carried out at a distance, with little or no physical contact with the victim. No physical strength, prowess or even bravery is required. Even a single shot handgun, as Mr. Penn told us, can be fired and re-loaded very quickly.

In summary, guns give people like Thomas Hamilton, who was an inadequate and pathetic individual, a capability of walking into a school and killing as many children and adults as they choose. In these circumstances it is not difficult to understand that the relevant studies demonstrate a direct relationship between the rate of gun crime and gun availability.

It is against this overall background that the operation by Central Scotland Police of the firearms licensing system must be considered. Did they discharge their heavy responsibility in a professional and reasonably careful manner? In my submission the answer is no, with the direct result that Hamilton was able to do what he did on the 13th March/

March of this year in Dunblane Primary School.

It is nothing to the point to stress that no one foresaw or could have foreseen that Hamilton would do what he did. The basis of the legislative framework and the premise on which the firearms licensing system should have operated is that it is apparent and obvious firstly that guns are lethal in the wrong hands, and secondly, people have and will continue to cause injury and death with guns, sometimes in the dreadful circumstances of Hungerford, Tasmania and Dunblane.

The/

The legislation speaks of reason to believe that a person is for any reason unfitted to be entrusted with a firearm. If any such reason exists, the certificate must be refused. For present purposes emphasis is on the trustworthiness of the individual, not on whether or not the person has in the past been violent or has acted in a dangerous manner with firearms. This applies to an individual's very first application as well as to subsequent applications, thus it is obvious that general character is to the forefront. In other words, this is or should be preventative police work.

It follows, sir, one might have thought that no police force would require hard evidence that a firearms certificate holder is behaving in a violent or improper manner with firearms before taking such preventative action. Such an approach is the very opposite to preventative justice. It is a locking the stable door philosophy on firearms licensing.

Further, one might have thought that no police force would proceed upon the basis of the supposed freedom of the individual to possess and use a gun. However, it is plain from Mr. McMurdo's statement to this Inquiry that this consideration did influence his thinking. (Day 12, pp. 1526-7).

One might have thought that no police force would delegate its responsibility to the public prosecution system with all the different criteria and responsibility carried by that agency. One might have thought that no police force would only act if the Fiscal acted. However, again it is clear that rather than exercising an independent discretion, the police in effect abandoned or delegated their responsibility to the public prosecution service in an apparent ignorance of the very different context and criteria in the Fiscal's responsibilities.

One might have thought that no police force would allow itself to be swayed by fear of having to justify its decisions in the Sheriff Court but Mr. McMurdo told us that he was always very conscious of how a Sheriff would react to a decision/decision (p. 1527 and p. 1506D).

LORD CULLEN: Just to be clear about that point, Mr. Campbell. If the police force recognise accurately and correctly that there is no prospect of a Sheriff doing anything other than sustaining the appeal, do you say that they should disregard that?

MR. CAMPBELL: What I say, sir, is that they should apply their minds to the question and come to a judgment on it, free from any concern of possible embarrassment.

LORD CULLEN: Yes, I understand that. In other words, the risk is another thing but obviously they have got to apply the law just as the Sheriff has although their roles may be very different. So there is a sense, I suppose, in which it is perfectly appropriate for them to take cognisance of what the Sheriff may be thinking, meaning it is quite clear that the appeal will be successful, so is there any point in a Chief Constable, in fact is it proper for a Chief Constable to revoke in such circumstances?

MR. CAMPBELL: If that matter was quite clear, the issue of appeal to the Sheriff would never enter into one's thinking. One would simply decide.

LORD CULLEN: The true question would be that there were no ground for revocation.

MR. CAMPBELL: Yes.

LORD CULLEN: So what you are looking at is if there is no separate point with regard to the Sheriff? I mean, there either is or is not grounds for revocation.

MR. CAMPBELL: Yes.

LORD CULLEN: And what you are saying also I think is that the risk of adverse result in itself should not enter into the equation at all, is that right?

MR. CAMPBELL: Indeed. One might have thought that in considering whether a person can be trusted/trusted with weapons, issues of general trustworthiness, honesty and reliability would not be dismissed as unimportant matters. However, Mr. McMurdo in his evidence to Mr. Taylor was at pains to downgrade such concepts (pp. 1581-5 and pp. 1601-2).

One might have thought that all those with responsibility for the system and procedures would have a reasonably clear understanding of the law and the statutory requirements or at least recognise when it was necessary to seek advice or further information on the facts. However, the evidence is peppered with incomplete or inaccurate statements as to the relevant legal tests by senior officers of Central Scotland Police. So far as Mr. McMurdo's evidence is concerned, I would refer to his evidence at 1458E and 1529-32.

One might have thought that some system would be instigated and operated to ensure that a complete picture of all relevant information relating to an applicant was available to those making the decision on his firearms application. However, Central Scotland Police's system in this regard was woefully inadequate. Worryingly, Mr. McMurdo appeared to show little understanding of why a complete picture was even desirable (p. 1534).

What appears to have happened is that isolated incidents were considered on their own and then forgotten or at least ignored when further incidents occurred. In this regard, sir, I note, and indeed Mr. McMurdo agreed with this, that the bulk of what is now known about Hamilton after this whole Inquiry was known to the police before the 13th March. That is a reference to Mr. McMurdo's evidence (p. 1547).

Sir, I now turn to a brief consideration of the factual matters known to the police about Hamilton before the 14th March. In my submission, the evidence discloses that they include the following: firstly, that on various occasions he had committed a variety of crimes, including the crimes of assault, child neglect, indecent behaviour and breach of the peace.

Secondly, that he was a scheming, vindictive, deceitful liar who harboured an obsessional/obsessional grudge against the Scout Movement and was hostile to the police.

Thirdly, that he was the subject of rumours and gossip and frequent complaints by parents because of his abnormal and unhealthy conduct towards young boys, serviced by his obsessional organisation of boys' clubs and camps. The police were privy to information which confirmed that the rumours, gossip and complaints were all true and justified.

Fourthly, that he was a misfit, a loner, a weirdo or an oddball who repelled most who met him.

Fifthly, that he had been expelled from the Scout Movement in the early 1970s for the reasons explained in the Scout Movement file upon Hamilton. That was a matter learned by D.C. Taylor in 1993.

Sixthly, that he made a habit of unjustified and time-consuming complaints, both formally and informally, about the police and indulged in a series of false and defamatory accusations about police officers. Transparently that was done with one end in view. That was to tire and eventually deflate his accusers and throw a smokescreen over his own activities. It is noteworthy that these tactics were remarkably successful in preserving Hamilton from effective action by a large number of agencies.

Seventhly, he was the subject of a clear and unequivocal recommendation from experienced police officers that he was unsuitable to be trusted with a firearm.

Sir, I would not claim that the above is a comprehensive list but in these circumstances was it not remarkable that the Depute Chief Constable, Mr. McMurdo, claimed that there were no contra-indicators to Hamilton's renewal applications (Day 12, p. 1505D).

Mr. McMurdo had sent Mr. Keenan's report a year or two previously and the Hughes' memo to the Fiscal at Dumbarton for reconsideration by the Fiscal there. Mr. McMurdo had written about Hamilton/

Hamilton to the Scottish Office in the letter of June 1992, that is DI33K, in the most uncomplimentary of terms, to put it at its very least, and this is just shortly before the 1992 renewal of Hamilton's certificate.

Mr. McMurdo was familiar with the Hughes' memorandum and we are told that he had read the Hughes' report to the Fiscal and the accompanying material. In my submission, that claim that there were no contra-indicators to Hamilton's renewal application speaks volumes about Mr. McMurdo's competence and about the culture and ethos prevalent in the Firearms Department at Central Scotland Police.

It was Mr. McMurdo who rejected D.S. Hughes' memo without even speaking to him. Had he spoken to D.S. Hughes, Mr. Hughes would no doubt have explained to him why he had doubts about Hamilton's mental stability, to take but one example from his memorandum. D.S. Hughes explained to us his thinking (Day 8, p. 921 and following pages). He explained that Hamilton was a man who outwardly appeared to be calm but underneath was very angry. He told us that his concern about this stability was prompted by the nature of the photographs taken by Hamilton of young children. His evidence on these photographs was not based upon recovered photographs but upon the evidence about the nature of the photographs which he took from the children involved.

No doubt had Mr. McMurdo or anyone else spoken to D.S. Hughes he would also have emphasised that while Mr. McMurdo might dismiss his considered evaluation and judgment as a gut feeling, the ten recommended charges could not be so easily dismissed. Here I refer to Mr. Hughes' evidence (Day 8, p. 929E) and also Mr. Bonomy's re-examination of him (p. 930).

It is again, in my submission, eloquent that at no stage did Mr. McMurdo look in Hamilton's firearms file. When asked why none of the information about Hamilton was in the firearms file, Mr. McMurdo's reply was (Day 12, p. 1514) "I didn't do the filing".

It was Mr. McMurdo who said, despite all the/the evidence to the contrary, not least the numerous police recommendations for criminal proceedings and the Hughes' memorandum, "I don't think anybody could have done anything which would have weeded this individual out" (p. I55ID-E).

It was Mr. McMurdo who said that it would be expecting too much to expect an applicant to be honest in his dealings with the police (p. I601-2).

It was Mr. McMurdo who talked about firearms applications as uncontested and as purely an administrative process unless a subordinate made some adverse recommendation (p. I550).

Nonetheless, Mr. McMurdo sanctioned, not least by his decision on Hughes' memorandum, the ethos in the Firearms Department which inhibited officers from acting upon any strong feelings unless action could be supported by hard proven fact, most obviously serious criminal convictions, a strong pending case on medical evidence of mental disorder.

The clearest evidence of this is Chief Superintendent Miller's manuscript note to the Hughes' memorandum. This note plainly and unequivocally reveals the culture operating in the Department at the time, in reference to Mr. Miller's evidence (p. 940). In my submission, no amount of sophistry now can change the meaning of what he then wrote. Before recalling its terms, it is worth remembering that Mr. Miller had very long experience in the Firearms Department. He wrote in response to Mr. Hughes' considered views "I cannot recommend the action proposed for obvious reasons. Hamilton has not been convicted of a crime and it seems that the Procurator-Fiscal is likely to 'no pro' the recently reported case". That was written, sir, despite the fact that Mr. Miller himself had encouraged the Fiscal to mount a prosecution (Day 8, p. 94I). Further, Mr. Miller recommended no action notwithstanding the fact that he had never met Hamilton (p.944E), nor for example seen the witness statements compiled during Mr. Hughes' investigation (p. 953C).

In my submission, this confirms, if confirmation is needed, that both Mr. Miller and Mr. McMurdo were acting in accordance with a general custom/custom and practice in the Firearms Department, namely that in the absence of something incontrovertible, in this instance a sufficiently serious conviction or a strong pending case, the police force would not take any responsibility. They would not even begin to exercise the discretion entrusted to them by Parliament in the interests of public safety to evaluate the known evidence and decide whether Hamilton was or was not fit to be trusted with a firearm. In my submission, that was a dereliction of duty of the highest order and can only be as a result of a slack and irresponsible culture built up over the years in which the firearms licensing system was operated on a purely administrative basis by administrators unwilling to take the responsibility entrusted to them by Parliament and upon which public safety depended.

When/

11 a.m.

When Detective Sergeant Hughes from the Child Protection Unit did stand back and say "This man should not have guns", this whole exercise was so foreign to the Firearms Department that Mr. Hughes was rebuffed in the most summary manner.

Sir, a specific issue does arise as to evidence given by WPC Anderson, and I would like to spend just a moment dealing with that.

WPC Anderson was the inquiry officer who visited Hamilton in respect to his January, 1995 renewal application. She left her brief meeting with Hamilton feeling very uneasy about him. She had been intimidated by his behaviour towards her. She told us that she wanted to find a reason to recommend that Hamilton's application should be refused.

She raised her concerns with a superior officer, Mr. Anderson (sic). She tells us that she was told in effect to forget all about this, because Hamilton had no convictions it would not matter what she said, Hamilton would get his certificate.

Sir, one may think that after the events of 1991 all of this has the ring of truth. This was WPC Anderson's first firearms enquiry. Plainly it made a very deep impression upon her. It is very likely that she remembers it clearly. It is most unlikely that DI Anderson (sic) has any clear recollection of it.

Nonetheless there is a conflict in the evidence between them. In my submission not only is WPC Anderson's recollection more likely to be correct, it is supported by other evidence, for example, Mr. Millar (946-7) agreed that the system operated by the Department had no room for preventative measures. He agreed, he said, in hindsight it should have had such room.

In the same passage Mr. Millar said that Hamilton would have required to be a drunkard or a violent criminal who used firearms, or would do so, or a man of proven mental disability before anything would be done.

Mr./

Mr. McMurdo (1508) told us that in his view to be unfit what was required was either a conviction leading to at least a three months sentence for assault, or if the sentence was lower one would require to assess the circumstances, for example whether the conviction involved threatening behaviour with a firearm. Alternatively, there would require to be a strong pending case, or (3) drunk driving convictions, or medical evidence of mental disorder.

At 1512 he agreed that great importance was given to whether the applicant had criminal convictions.

All of this in my submission goes some distance to supporting WPC Anderson's accounting for events, and more generally Chief Inspector Anderson -- sorry, Robertson, Chief Inspector Robertson in his evidence agreed that in general police forces place considerable emphasis upon the obtaining of what might be described as conclusive or hard and fast evidence.

So, sir, I invite you to prefer the evidence of WPC Anderson.

But the result of the attitude in the Firearms Department as revealed to WPC Anderson was that she felt compelled to sign a form expressing a view which in fact she did not hold.

LORD CULLEN: Just remind me, the person to whom she spoke -- what department was he in, what function was he fulfilling?

MR. CAMPBELL: He was DI Anderson (sic), who was described as her superior officer. I confess that I wouldn't want to just dogmatically assert that he was in the Firearms Department. I will certainly check it.

LORD CULLEN: I am doubtful about it. That is why I want to be sure.

MR. CAMPBELL: I will check it.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you.

MR. CAMPBELL: In any event, the result was/was that WPC Anderson felt compelled to sign a form expressing a view which she did not hold, namely that Hamilton was a suitable person to possess a firearms certificate.

I now turn to another conflict which emerges in the evidence, and it arises in the context of Mr. Holden's evidence, and it relates to the question of whether he ever changed his view of Hamilton. Perhaps I can make one or two preliminary remarks regarding Holden's evidence?

In my submission Mr. Holder was a somewhat unsatisfactory and unreliable witness. He prevaricated upon the question of whether, in his view, Hamilton was fit to possess a certificate. Here I refer to the evidence at day 7 (871-3), although eventually (873E) he accepted that a deceitful liar should not have a certificate.

Further in my submission he gave a less than satisfactory explanation (884) about the terms of his own written statement which were written by him, in which he says that at the time of the Hughes' memo he believed that Hamilton was not a fit and proper person to have a firearm. You will recall that in his evidence to us he sought to distance himself from that statement.

I think earlier I may have misled the Inquiry about Mr. Holden's rank. He was a detective chief inspector then. He is now a detective superintendent.

But reverting to the specific conflict which I mentioned a moment ago in the evidence, both Mr. Hughes and Mr. McMurdo gave evidence to the effect that at the time Mr. Holden supported the appraisal and the recommendation in the Hughes' memo, D82L. Here I refer to Mr. Hughes' evidence (904C and 906) to the effect that Holden shared a view that Hamilton was not suitable to have a firearms certificate.

Mr. McMurdo (Day 12, 1548B and Day 13, 1593-4) provides support for this in the sense that he told us that Holden's view about Hamilton had changed in 1993. Mr. Holden's evidence as to his belief held at the time of the Hughes' memorandum is, as I have submitted, uncertain and unsatisfactory./

unsatisfactory. However, once again a written note on the Hughes' memo speaks for itself. In this note Mr. Holden supported Mr. Hughes, and this also provides evidence in support of Mr. Hughes and Mr. McMurdo's evidence to us -- to you, sir -- that Holden agreed with Hughes at that time.

The issue therefore comes to be whether Mr. McMurdo's evidence that Holden changed his view in 1993 is true. In my submission the important factor here is that there is nothing in Mr. Holden's evidence to support Mr. McMurdo on this. Here I refer to Mr. Holden's evidence (Day 7, pages 868, 880 and 883-4). This evidence related to his interview with Hamilton after complaints had been made about Hamilton's running of the 1993 camp at Dunblane. Mr. Holden told us that Hamilton refused to provide the names of the committee. He told us that his impression of Hamilton was that he was -- and I quote: "Quite obsessive, extremely obsessive", that he lied to Mr. Holden, and Mr. Holden told us that he was of the view that Hamilton may have been guilty of some sort of illegality, and that he was still a risk to children.

We were told that Mr. Holden reported back to Mr. McMurdo (869 and 879), but there is not even a whisper in his evidence of any change of view on his part. To the contrary, the account of the interview with Hamilton in my submission backs up and supports many of the features lying behind the earlier Hughes' memorandum.

It is noteworthy, but by now not surprising, that no one took any action in respect of Hamilton's firearms certificate after the parental complaints and the investigations in 1993.

What did happen was another fruitless attempt by DC Taylor and DS Moffat to obtain a positive response from the Procurator Fiscal's Service. By 1993 the general picture is of both DC Taylor and DS Moffat trying almost desperately to provoke the Fiscals at Stirling into action, without success.

However, for present purposes, I wish to draw attention to the attitude of both DC Taylor and DS Moffat towards Hamilton in 1993. Mr. Taylor made his views clear in his report to the Fiscal and in/

in his request for a search warrant.

Mr. Taylor, we can recall, was given access to the Scout Movement file and spoke to Mr. Brian Fairgrieve. The contents of the Scout file have been discussed at length in the evidence, and one may think that that file speaks volumes about Hamilton's bad character, his lack of trustworthiness, and the benefits of the early and effective action taken by the Scout Movement.

Even if Mr. Fairgrieve did discount the reference to mental instability in Mr. Jefferies' letter, there remained more than enough throughout that file to set alarm bells ringing.

So far as Mr. Moffat is concerned (Day 8, 1002), we learned that after obtaining more information about Hamilton he spoke once more to the local Fiscal and I quote "to try again".

Despite the Fiscal's rejection of his approaches, Mr. Moffat continued searching for more evidence in order to secure a form of prosecution of Hamilton.

More and more complaints were coming in (C1003-4). Eventually, a long time later, there was a joint investigation with the Social Work Department, and a meeting on the 21st August, 1995 (D229 of file J(i)), a meeting on 21st August, 1995 which we were told by Mr. Moffat was the culmination of a lot of concern held by many people.

What is noteworthy is that none of this had any impact upon Mr. Hamilton's firearms certificate. At 1010 and 1017 Mr. Moffat made it plain that he was of a view that a crime had been committed, and that Hamilton was a devious and deceitful man. Also he told us that people were guarded in how they dealt with Hamilton.

On that last matter, it is by no means possible to be certain about this, but one explanation, or at least partial explanation, if not justification, for the repeated renewals of Hamilton's certificate, and the rejection of calls for its revocation, just might lie in the history of repeated complaints to all and sundry about the conduct of the police.

Mr. McMurdo denied this, but his lack of positive action may at least in part be attributed to a conscious or unconscious wariness of the inevitable consequences of crossing Thomas Hamilton.

That said, and whatever the true position about that may be, the evidence on other matters more than demonstrates that other more general failures in the system operated by the police led to Hamilton being permitted to retain lawful possession of handguns.

I have touched on some of these above, but will dwell for a moment on a further contributory factor, if I may. It is that it would appear that the decision maker would simply sign the form put in front of him, in the absence of any concerns raised by officers below, whereas those below assumed that the decision was not theirs, but that of the superior who would review all relevant facts -- or so it was thought.

I will attempt to illustrate this point by some passages in the evidence. On Day 9, (1077) Chief Inspector Mather, who was in charge of the Firearms Department, tells us that the file relating to an individual applicant was not considered unless someone below raised a concern, and otherwise it was just a matter of checking the form.

At Day 8 (955) Chief Superintendent Millar stressed that while the decision was a decision of a superior officer, the superior officer relied on the recommendations or the absence of recommendations from those below him in the chain of command.

We know that when Mr. McMurdo, for example, renewed Hamilton's certificate in 1995 he had only the form in front of him (Day 12, 1459 and 1487). He told us at 1503 that the renewal took -- and I quote "a very short time", and he emphasised that he had 30 to 40 such applications to deal with a week, and that he had many other things to do apart from deal with firearms licensing matters.

Likewise Mr. Adamson in 1992, when renewing Hamilton's certificate, would simply sign the/the certificate unless something adverse was mentioned to him. This was the way Mr. McMurdo put it (1484). Mr. McMurdo (1550) spoke of "uncontested applications" and "a purely administrative process". He told us (1504-5) that he relied on those below him in the chain.

If the decision maker is relying upon those below drawing problems to his attention, it is of critical importance that those below him know that this is the case. The evidence however gives the overall impression that those below considered that the decision was being taken by the superior officer rather than by them. Thus there was no overriding imperative for them to identify all or any contraindicators, or to ensure that any unfavourable impression or gut feeling, if one wants to put it that way, was conveyed up the line.

The unhappy result is that in fact no one was exercising the required careful judgment for a full and proper consideration of all relevant considerations, including the cumulative and complete picture built up over the years.

As/

As my learned friend Mr. Bonomy put the point yesterday, the matter fell between two stools. This theme is also to be found in Mr. Richardson's report at Page 14. Not only the spirit but also the letter of the legislation which requires the Chief Officer or his authorised delegate in terms of Section 55 of the Act, the Deputy Chief Constable, to carry out a careful evaluation. A very clear example is the renewal by Mr. Adamson in 1992. Mr. Adamson had never seen Hughes' memorandum but he told us that he was aware of its existence in 1992. He told us that he was also aware that Mr. McMurdo had not revoked Hamilton's certificate as a result of the Hughes' memorandum.

It never occurred to him when the renewal application came in shortly after to do anything other than sign the form put in front of him. It was, one suspects, treated as a matter of pure routine with no independent judgment exercise whatsoever -- simply a rubber stamp was applied to the application. Mr. McMurdo tells us at 1484 that he would have expected no more from Mr. Adamson.

Sir, another factor that I would wish to consider briefly is the question of enquiry or the system of enquiry into Hamilton's personal suitability. In my submission, there was simply no system in force which would discover problems or prompt an active investigation and inquiry into the issue of, for example, personal suitability. The Home Office Guidance at Paragraph 6.9 stresses that character was the main concern. However, this main concern was in effect ignored by Central Scotland Police. Instead, more or less complete reliance was placed upon the heavily criticised form RL3a and the intimation to the Department of the relevant circumstances such as convictions or pending cases.

The Force standing orders and procedures and the level of inquiry and thoroughness of the investigation carried out in Hamilton's case over the years were heavily criticised in Mr. Richardson's report. I do not intend to repeat these criticisms but there are all of a piece with a picture of complacency, carelessness and poor management, a picture which emerges from the other evidence which I have already discussed.

Turning/

Turning now if I may to the question of information recording by Central Scotland Police: the constant theme of Mr. Richardson's opinion is the failure of any of the reports, memoranda etc. upon Hamilton, including those sent to Fiscals recommending criminal proceedings, to find their way on to either Hamilton's firearms file or on to the Force's Criminal Intelligence system. In my submission, in this context it is simply not enough for Mr. McMurdo to say that he knew Hamilton well. In my submission, it was unrealistic for him to proceed upon the expectation that he could and would recall all relevant matters in appropriate detail when sifting through the 30 or 40 applications when hard pressed by his many other duties.

In any event, the reality is, as he explained, he never went to look for Hamilton's firearms file, and in the absence of any recommendations from below treated all of this as a matter of routine (1515 and 1550-1).

It may be thought that many questions arose such as what about the lack of information available to those making or considering any recommendations below in the chain of command, or suppose that someone else was acting for the Deputy Chief Constable when he was absent, or what would happen when the Deputy Chief Constable left for another job. Further, what about looking at the cumulative picture as it built up over the years rather than focusing only on the immediate past.

Simply by way of an example of this problem, on more than one occasion DCC McMurdo said in evidence that there was no record of Hamilton having behaved inappropriately with firearms (1581-5). Presumably when giving that evidence he adopted the position he adopted also in 1991 and 1995 to the report made by Inspector Nimmo after Sergeant McGrain's investigation into the family visit by Hamilton with guns in late 1988. Those guns included a Beretta semi-automatic machine gun. We know that although the matter was relayed to Mr. McMurdo (the evidence of Inspector Nimmo at Pg. 819) this material did not appear in Hamilton's firearms file nor could it be found in the Force's Criminal Intelligence system. This is perhaps just a small example of the problem of relying upon fallible memory even assuming that fallible memory has had brought/brought to its attention by someone all the relevant information. But, that said, sadly again when we come to the general approach of Mr. McMurdo and the Firearms Department, it is nonetheless unlikely that even if he had recalled and reconsidered this incident when subsequent decisions were taken, it is unlikely that this would have made any material difference.

Turning to Mr. McMurdo's evidence itself: Mr. McMurdo set himself the difficult task of explaining that no mistakes were made and that every decision could be justified. The plethora of adverse information available to him and known by him about Hamilton, the recommendations of Detective Sergeant Hughes were dismissed for a variety of reasons which I have touched upon already, and there was no evidence to support the view that Hamilton was unfit to be trusted with weapons. Mr. McMurdo placed emphasis upon the supportive and positive impression of some parents (1567) and that may be thought to be a somewhat inconsistent approach when Mr. McMurdo considered it appropriate to regard the adverse impressions by officers and others as irrelevant.

He also placed emphasis upon the lack of criminal record. Sir, it is of course possible that after the awful events of 13th March and when turning to consider the matters there was at least a degree of ex post facto rationalisation and justification taking place when Mr. McMurdo and others were giving their evidence. Indeed, the evidence of Professor Cooke in his cross-examination by Mr. Taylor, albeit in a very different context, did explain that after a tragedy such as Dunblane people may revise their recollection of events. It is therefore perhaps of importance to place more weight upon contemporaneous documentation and the conduct of those involved rather than their current explanation of past events.

In my submission, the reality may be that the thought processes and explanations given in some detail by Mr. McMurdo and others played little or no part in the actual events to which they are now attached, and that many of the decisions were taken and certificates granted as a matter of routine with virtually no care or consideration taken by any one. That said, there remains the difficulty for Mr. McMurdo and for the police force that/that the explanations now given, even if accepted at face value, do not extricate the Force from criticism that they acted without due care and below the professional standards which the police are entitled to expect.

For example, the explanations proceeded upon the basis of such a narrow definition of personal unsuitability as to allow not only Hamilton but also one must assume others to escape any considered scrutiny and judgment of their character and its consequence for being trusted with weapons. The explanations not only lack this but also the rejection of the Hughes' memorandum amount to an unwillingness to act unless it is rendered more or less essential by prior conviction in a criminal Court or a decision by a public prosecutor to mount a case or by some other clear and uncontrovertible evidence. To dismiss, for example, Detective Sergeant Hughes' conclusions as no more than a gut feeling is itself in my submission a revealing approach. In fact, Mr. Hughes was doing what Mr. McMurdo was required to do -- that is to consider the known facts and apply his mind to the critical question, the critical question which inevitably requires the exercise of a matter of judgment, even one might say impression, in the light of the known facts, namely is Hamilton or was Hamilton a fit and proper person to be entrusted with weapons. There is no convincing evidence that apart from Mr. Hughes and Mr. Holden anyone else ever applied their mind to this question.

Perhaps one exception to this is the relatively little role of WPC Anderson after her unpleasant experience of Hamilton, but her questioning mind was soon overruled.

In my submission, the attempt which has been mounted to discredit Detective Sergeant Hughes' opinion lacks weight and credibility. Here I refer to the evidence from Mr. McMurdo at (1536-41 and 1581-5). If Mr. McMurdo had indeed analysed matters in the way which I now suggest in my submission this itself is clear evidence of extremely poor judgment on his part. If it was true that he concluded that there was quite literally no evidence to support Hughes' opinion, why did he not discuss the matter with him before rejecting his recommendations: or did he, as in so many/many other cases, simply adopt the recommendations of Mr. Miller about the consideration he must attempt to justify that decision. Is it not the truth that in the absence of something like a serious conviction Central Scotland Police were not prepared to exercise the kind of independent and sensible judgment which Detective Sergeant Hughes, a stranger to the Firearms Department, brought to the matter.

Mr. McMurdo's difficulties in the witness box were apparent with his volte face as to whether the Hughes' memorandum, if accurate, describes someone who was unfit to be trusted with weapons. When this matter was put to him at (1509) his answer was a clear Yes and his explanation was that the problem was that there was no evidence, at least in Mr. McMurdo's view, to support the Hughes' conclusions. That position in my submission bears no scrutiny whatsoever. However, the next day in cross-examination by Mr. Taylor Mr. McMurdo changed his evidence to the effect that even if the Hughes' memorandum was true and accurate persons such as those described in the memorandum nonetheless could and should be granted firearms certificates (1581-5). That is, in my submission, an equally startling proposition: according to Mr. McMurdo, untrustworthy people of poor character would obtain guns unless they had already acted in a dangerous manner with the guns or had shown themselves to be untrustworthy specifically with guns.

This not only flies in the face of the Home Office Guidance at 6.9 but also the plain terms of the relevant legislation. Again this is an approach which bears little scrutiny. It does mean that in effect Central Scotland Police would wait until damage may be done before taking any positive action. The notion that Parliament and the public expected them to exercise a judgment as to whether an applicant should be trusted with weapons in the first place played no part in the Firearms Department philosophy.

This whole line of thinking led Mr. McMurdo into the surprising proposition that it would be expecting too much to expect a firearms applicant to be honest in his dealings with the police and that proven untrustworthiness was not a relevant consideration (1581-5 and 1601-2). When your/your lordship raised with Mr. McMurdo the question that his responsibilities implied a reference to trust, and in particular honest when dealing with the police (1601-2) Mr. McMurdo appeared to be taken aback by this whole approach.

Mr. McMurdo of course required to deal with the terms of his own letter to Mrs. Hogg of the Scottish Office in January, 1992 (D133K). He faced immediate difficulty with that letter set out his own views and was signed by him and the thoughts in the letter could not be dismissed in the same way as the Hughes' memorandum. Further, Mr. McMurdo faced a problem that the known facts more than justified the views expressed by him in that letter. Nonetheless, there was at least an attempt to dilute the terms of the letter at least regarding the passage referring to irrational outpourings (1571). At (1524-5), although he accepted that the letter, with the possible exception of the irrational outpourings reference was factually correct, and he stood by it in general terms, this was a letter written by him in January, 1992 very shortly after the rejection of the Hughes' memorandum and just before the 1992 renewal and course before Mr. McMurdo's renewal of the certificate in 1995.

In my submission, the overall conclusion can be reached that the system of firearms control in Central Scotland Police was regarded as, and operated as, an administrative matter and only an administrative matter. There was no recommendation and appreciation of the task entrusted by Parliament to the Department to investigate and assess the personal suitability, to properly investigate and assess the personal suitability of each applicant before entrusting him with weapons.

Sir/

Sir, organisations are occasionally criticised for failing to act in what is referred to as a pro-active manner. To only react to events is often considered wholly inadequate. The Firearms Department of Central Scotland Police were clearly not pro-active; they were not even reactive to the events; rather, they were inactive, and that despite overwhelming evidence that positive action was required. This overall approach did not change even when Detective Sergeant Hughes recommended what was by then no more than commonsense and should have been obvious to the police, that is that Hamilton was not a fit and proper person and should not have been entrusted with weapons. The dead hand of a purely administrative system, incapable of independent judgment and unwilling to exercise the quasi-judicial function expected of it, failed to prevent the use of a gun by Thomas Hamilton.

Sir, earlier in my submissions I dealt with the causal link between that failure and what happened on the 13th March. The result is that but for that culpable failure by Central Scotland Police it is probable that the events of the 13th March in Dunblane Primary School would not have occurred.

Sir, before leaving the matter of the conduct of Central Scotland Police I wish to make a few brief submissions on another matter which relates to this incident, and that refers to the evidence given by Mrs. Doreen Haggar. You will have appreciated, sir, that none of my submissions in relation to Central Scotland Police depend on the evidence of Mrs. Haggar. However, I wish to say a few words.

In relation to the incident spoken to by Mrs. Haggar concerning the presentation of a firearm to her by Hamilton in the street, one question is, did this incident happen at all? In my submission the answer is probably yes. There is no good reason to reject it. One has the reference -- perhaps in connection to earlier incidents, but one does have the reference from Mrs. Haggar that Hamilton referred to his guns as friends, and that certainly has the ring of truth.

So far as the incident itself is concerned/concerned, she described something at the end of the barrel which one might well think equates to the muzzle weight referred to by other witnesses. It may be, however, there will be no real challenge to whether the incident did or did not occur.

The other question that arises, sir, is, did she report the matter to the police? There is a considerable amount of evidence about this, which you will no doubt weigh carefully.

One possible explanation, sir, is that Mrs. Haggar did not present the incident to the police primarily as an episode involving alarm to her and the presentation of a firearm to her in a threatening manner. Maybe, from the overall thrust of her evidence, she was more concerned with the fact he should never have had guns there in the first place. There may be some support for this general approach in the ultimate response from the police officers, namely the explanation that everything was all right, because Mr. Hamilton was simply taking the weapons from Point A to Point B.

It does appear that Mrs. Haggar was at no stage frightened by this incident: indeed, she tells us she said effectively to Hamilton to put the gun away or she would simply stick it down his throat. She told the police officer she was not alarmed. Indeed, all her other behaviour appears to be concentrated on the threat of Hamilton to people other than herself, and it may well be that the police simply did not consider that the whole matter was worthy of further action.

The question does, however, remain as to why it is this incident has not been discovered in the police records. In that context, for wholly understandable reasons it is not possible now to put together a complete account of all the notebooks and to obtain evidence from all police personnel who might have been involved. It is also of course possible that the incident was never recorded, for example, and one notes the difficulty encountered in substantiating the "Inspector Ralph" incident, if I can call it that.

Be that all as it may, given I anticipate there would be some other comment about Mrs. Haggar, I would wish to say it appeared to me she/

she was a brave and determined lady, and to an extent effective, albeit by the use of somewhat unorthodox methods. However, again it appeared she was driven to these unorthodox methods by the inactivity on the part of a number of agencies. Mrs. Haggart joined the ranks of the very few who had sought to do something positive about Thomas Hamilton. Sir, that is all I wish to say about Central Scotland Police. The next chapter of submissions relates to the public prosecution service, and that section will be given by my learned junior, Miss Dunlop.

LORD CULLEN: Yes. Miss Dunlop?

MISS DUNLOP: Thank you, sir. I have summarised my comments on paper, primarily because I have identified particular children. This was necessary in connection with the question of whether or not there was sufficient evidence to support a prosecution. In accordance with our established practice I do not propose to read out the names of the particular children; I will attempt to identify them perhaps by initials, and other parties have a copy of these. I also wish to make some reference to one or two authorities, copies of which should be before you, sir.

There arises the question of whether or not Thomas Hamilton committed crimes in the course of his involvement with children prior to 13th March 1996, both at his boys' clubs and at his camps. This question is of particular relevance in examining the occasions on which Hamilton was reported to the Procurator-Fiscal. Whether he was guilty of a crime is also of significance in assessing the attitude of senior members of Central Scotland Police to reports of Hamilton's conduct.

A number of possible offences have been referred to. It was suggested that Hamilton may have been guilty of assaults, of breaches of the Children and Young Persons (Scotland) Act, 1937, of breach of the peace, of fraud, of embezzlement and of attempting to pervert the course of justice. There would have been difficulties in relation to the latter three offences, and it is therefore not my intention to make submissions in relation to possible charges of any of these offences.

Before/

Before turning to consider the particular evidence available to support any of these charges it may be helpful to set out some general observations regarding the law relating to this case.

Assault. It was clearly irrelevant that allegations of assault were made in connection with actions which Hamilton claimed were reasonable chastisement of children in his care. Now, there is a considerable body of case law in this area. The leading case is Wilson v. Norrie, in Parent and Child, 177 at 181, to which I will refer. Some references I make are to cases and material published more recently, but that is purely for the purpose of evidencing principles as they already existed.

The summary on Wilson v. Norrie is an historical summary of information in this area. Looking at page 177, the authors begin discussion of the topic of discipline, and they set out in the first full paragraph on page 177 their comment that the object is the welfare of the child, and that that object, while it sanctions, also limits the right. It says "So punishment must be moderate and reasonable in relation to its end. If it is, then it constitutes a defence to a charge of cruelty to the child, to a charge of criminal assault and to a claim for damages for civil assault".

Then, under "Delegability of Disciplinary Power" it states that parents may allow others to discipline their children.

At page 178 in a section headed "Purpose" it states "The authorities bring out clearly that the power of discipline is related to and limited by the purposes for which a person has a child in his care and the resultant duties. The parental power to discipline a child flows from the duty to further the child's welfare and, importantly, to educate the child. For this reason the power vests in school teachers, though only as part of their educative function".

They then comment on the power of the teachers who administer discipline, but note immediately that there are now restrictions on the ability of teachers to administer certain corporal punishment/punishment, and although it is not a crime for a teacher to administer corporal punishment, the Education (Scotland) Act, 1980 removed the possibility of claiming reasonable chastisement in defence of an action for damages for assault.

Looking at page 179, in a section headed "Reasonable and Moderate Chastisement", it states "The problematic cases in the exercise of the power of discipline have been cases on the use of corporal punishment. This is because this form of discipline would, without the justification of being a parental right, amount to a civil or criminal wrong, which for example, imposing extra homework would not. It is only reasonable and moderate chastisement is permitted, and doubt may now hang over the traditional Scottish method of corporal punishment within schools. What is today acceptable punishment by parents may well be limited to slaps and the like that do not cause injury, extensive bruising or long-lasting pain. Excess constitutes an assault. Standards of reasonableness and moderation are subject to development, and for that reason the older cases may form an imperfect guide. What constitutes excess may, in any event, vary according to the circumstances of the case including the age, sex and any known disabilities or weaknesses of the child".

There is then a quotation from a judgment of Lord Justice General Emslie's: "To slap a child of two years old on the face, knocking him over, is an act as remote from reasonable chastisement as one can possibly imagine". There is then reference to a number of other cases.

Then, sir, moving to six lines from the foot of page 180: "An objectionable method of punishment may also constitute excess irrespective of whether physical harm results. Thus, in Ewart v. Brown, which is a 19th Century case, "Although the action failed because a causal connection between the condition from which the Pursuer suffered and the assault was not proved, the action of the Defender in striking a pupil on the head with a blackboard pointer was clearly considered to amount to a wrong". And in Ryan v. Fildes, which is 1938, "Mr. Justice Tucker said of a teacher who had struck a boy on the side of his head with her hand: 'The blow struck was moderate in the sense that/that it was not a very violent blow, but as punishment, it was not moderate punishment, because I do not think that the proper way of punishing a child is to strike it on the head or the ear'. " The last sentence of that section is "In any event, it appears that there are certain methods of punishment that are to be regarded as in themselves improper, and a blow to the head generally comes into that category".

It is worthy to note that the focus of their discussion is the right of the parent or other person who had continuing responsibility for bringing up a child, such as a teacher, to use discipline in bringing up the child, but the right of a third party who has charge of that child for a short period of time rather than a continuing responsibility may be more limited.

Dealing next with the question of ill-treatment, Section 12 of the Children and Young Persons (Scotland) Act, 1937 makes it an offence to assault, ill-treat, neglect, abandon or expose a child in a manner likely to cause him unnecessary suffering or injury. By Section 12(1) to (2) a person legally liable to maintain a child is deemed to have treated him in a manner likely to cause injury to health if he fails to provide adequate clothing. The most recent case on this is H. v. Lees and D. v. Orr 1994 SLT 908, to which I would refer you.

LORD CULLEN: If you tell me the points you wish to draw from it, and I can read the case myself in what is left of my leisure time.

MISS DUNLOP: Yes. At page 911E the Lord Justice General notes the distinction between Section 12(1) and 12(2), in other words, that by Section 12(2) where a person who has the legal right to maintain a child omits to provide certain things he is deemed to be guilty of the offence of neglect, or whatever. In my view that is of some significance because of this reference for example to adequate clothing is to be neglect.

At page 913A, this is a response to submissions that the Act is only directed at very serious assault; in 913C there is a quotation from R. v. Senior, again a 19th Century case, that "Neglect/

"Neglect is the want of reasonable care -- that is, the omission of such steps as a reasonable parent would take, such as are usually taken in the ordinary experience of mankind". I pause here to note the "reasonable parent" test, and to remark that the instruction given to Constable Gunn when he first went to Inchmoan Island by his sergeant "Apply your mind to whether you would be happy to see your own child in these conditions" seems to be a sensible one in the light of what the Courts have decided.

12 noon

There is further reference to the reasonable parent at 913G-H and I also refer to what was said at page 914 in the right hand column where there is an examination of the case of the second child, who is a 13½ year old child, left at home in the evening and that conviction failed and fell to be quashed because of the lack of evidence that what was done was unlikely to lead to unnecessary suffering and I emphasise in particular the Sheriff had failed to make any finding that the fact that the child was in fact upset was connected with having been left and that is at page 914J. At 914L it is commented "If any harm had happened to the children while they were unattended, so that there was evidence of actual suffering or actual injury to health, it might have been a relatively simple matter for the Crown to establish that an offence under section 12(1) of the Act had been committed".

The other case to which I refer in connection with the 1937 Act is KENNEDY v. S. 1986 SLT 679. The most important passage in that case is in the left hand column of page 682 where Lord Hunter considered it to be a plain fact on the circumstances of that case that a breach of section 12 had been established and that notwithstanding the fact that the children were clean and well fed and that conviction arose out of an incident where children had spent the night in a cellar with inadequate cover.

Finally, breach of the peace. It is sufficient to make two points. The first is the breadth of the conduct which can be held to amount to a breach of the peace having been observed by Lord Justice General Emslie in MONTGOMERY v. McLEOD 1977 SLT notes 77, a copy of which should also be there, that "There is no limit to the kind of conduct which may give rise to a charge of breach of the peace". There is also D v. ORR 1994 SLT 624 which was an example of the breadth and types of conduct which have grounded convictions for breach of the peace. There is in that case emphasis of the point which I make as my second point, that evidence of actual alarm is not essential.

I have also referred to the case of WILSON/

WILSO v. BROWN 1982 SLT 361 and YOUNG v. HEATLY 1959 JC 66 as authority for that. I have omitted to say that breach of the peace certainly includes shouting and swearing and that there are a number of examples of prosecutions of people for shouting and swearing at police.

Turning then to particular episodes, I would submit that Hamilton could have been prosecuted for at least the following offences: firstly, in 1988 an assault of the child LD, aged 9. There is evidence from the child himself that he was struck on the face and back by Hamilton when he said he wanted to go home. The incident can be identified as having occurred on the 10th July, 1988 and as having given rise to a red mark on the child's back and is described in the statements of five other boys which I have identified there.

Secondly, the assault of the child DW, aged 9. There is evidence from the child himself that he was struck on the face for fainting while doing exercises. There is corroborative evidence from another four boys.

A breach of section 12 of the 1937 Act in relation to the enforced wearing of only swimming trunks. Virtually all the children refer to this and state that they were cold. Neglect in relation to carrying children on an overloaded boat without there being life jackets for them all. The particular incident where a member of the public pointed it out to Hamilton is described by four boys and the boys referred to other boys being assessed by Hamilton as being good swimmers who were denied life jackets.

In 1991, the charges framed by the then Detective Sergeant Hughes and the submission of his report and I identify the particular boys who support the main body of the charges in that report.

In 1993, the researches of DC Taylor revealed that Hamilton had deceived parents regarding his intended activities with their children and photographing the children while they were scantily clad and on one occasion alone. Detective Constable Taylor makes it clear on page 2 of his memorandum that the parents were alarmed, disgusted, angry and concerned. In his evidence to the/the Inquiry he clarified that their concern related both to what had occurred and what might have taken place. In these circumstances, a charge of breach of the peace could have been brought.

In Mr. Vannet's report it is stated that in relation to the 1988 episode there were discrepancies between the accounts given by the boys and that these discrepancies increased after re-precognition. The further precognitions are not available to the Inquiry. There is no evidence to identify the discrepancies in the original material which was thought to be significant. It is also stated that the incidents for which there was corroborative and consistent evidence were very minor.

The 1988 camp was the subject of a further report to the Procurator Fiscal when Inspector Keenan remitted the material which he had uncovered in investigating Hamilton's complaints against the police. It is apparent that there was a failure in communication at this point. His report was not sent with a covering letter and as it was not read in any detail by the Fiscal, it was either not appreciated that the report related to Hamilton's actions as well as those of police officers or it was not appreciated that the matters referred to were different in relation to those which the Fiscal had already decided not to proceed upon. Mr. Cardle was unable to recall his thought processes at that time.

LORD CULLEN: I take it he is the Fiscal referred to in that paragraph?

MISS DUNLOP: Yes. The case of McLEOD v. TIFFENY 1994 SLT 53, which should be the last of the cases in the bundle, deals with the situation of a criminal charge and a complaint against the police arising out of the same incident and the need to ensure that the accused is not prejudiced at his trial by the Fiscal having information which has been gathered in the investigation of his complaint. In that case, the Court considered and approved the guidance on these matters issued in 1993 to Regional Procurators Fiscal, which guidance reflected developed practice. The comments of the Lord Justice General at page 537C-E appear restricted to the conflict of a complaint arising out of the same incident./

incident. It is doubtful whether the same restrictions would apply to the evidence of a crime committed after information which is uncovered during the investigation of a complaint, as Mr. Cardle himself recognised in his evidence.

In any event, as the material is very similar in nature to the material which had been contained in the earlier report, it appears unlikely as a matter of fact that the Fiscal would have raised proceedings even if he had appreciated that he was being asked to consider different matters.

LORD CULLEN: Just before you go further, in the paragraph at the top of the page you say that it is not appreciated that the matters referred to were different.

MISS DUNLOP: Yes.

LORD CULLEN: Where will I find some description of what the difference is?

MISS DUNLOP: Well, unfortunately, my lord, really what is necessary is a comparison of the two and one sees that it was a product of Hamilton's rolling summer camps that what in summary had been in the earlier report were accounts of events prior to the episode at Inchmoan on the 20th July, most of them being events of the week of 3rd to the 10th and some in the week 10th to the 17th July. When one looks at what Inspector Keenan summarised in his report, he applied his mind mainly to slightly later events, that is in the weeks towards the end of July, and his statements almost entirely come from seeing Hamilton. So very similar in nature but technically different events because they involved different victims.

LORD CULLEN: Just remind me in case I have misunderstood this; if we go back to what you referred to earlier as what might have been the subject of charges in 1988, is the material which falls into that area covered by his first report as opposed to the second?

MISS DUNLOP: Yes, indeed.

LORD CULLEN: So do you spell out anywhere, and I'm not saying you should, do you spell/spell out anywhere what came out of the second one?

MISS DUNLOP: No, I don't really for the reasons I have set out in that paragraph, that as a matter of fact the incidents in Inspector Keenan's report certainly were not worse than the incidents in the earlier report and they were very similar in nature, albeit to different boys.

In relation to the 1991 camp, Mr. Vannet's report refers to doubt by the Procurator Fiscal that there was sufficient evidence of criminality. In referring, as it does, to two different things, that is sufficient evidence and criminality, this comment is perhaps confusing. The ultimate decision appears to have been based on a view that the conduct, even if criminal, was very minor. This is borne out by DS Hughes recollection of the Fiscal's attitude (p.909).

It is worth noting that the Procurators Fiscal at Dumbarton and Stirling referred the matter to the Reporter to the Childrens Panel. The Reporter to the Childrens Panel was empowered to take action only when a child is thought to be in need of compulsory measures of care, now supervision as set out in the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, although that part of the 1995 Act is not yet in force. The Reporter has jurisdiction only over children with problems, not adults who pose problems to children. That is clear from part 3 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 and the corresponding provision of the 1995 Act. It was also made clear by Mr. Kelly, the retired Reporter to the Childrens Panel, in his evidence, particularly when he referred to himself as having stepped out of role in taking an interest after the 1992 referral. That was the referral, sir, after the boys were found in their pyjamas outside the Dunblane camp.

Similarly, the Social Work Department have rights and obligations in relation to children in whose care and upbringing there is concern but not in relation to adults whose contact with children may be undesirable. It is difficult to understand what it was hoped could be achieved by these referrals.

I have endeavoured to identify conduct by/by Hamilton which could have formed the subject matter of a criminal complaint in that the circumstances amounted to a crime and that there was sufficient evidence. No doubt any prosecution would not have been straightforward and Hamilton would have defended himself or been defended with characteristic vigour. He may have been acquitted.

Nevertheless, in the absence of a system of vetting adults working with children and the lack of statutory powers for any other agency to intervene, there would appear to have been no other means of attempting to fetter Hamilton's activities with children. The enormity of Hamilton's final act tends to obscure the fact that over many years with many children he behaved undesirably.

As well as the conduct identified above, there was the exposure to the boys required to sleep in the van in Aviemore in the winter of 1974 and the so-called gymnastics which have now been identified as overly strenuous and potentially harmful for children and his behaviour in introducing them to guns.

It has been suggested at times in the evidence to this Inquiry, and it is I think apparent from the comments I have highlighted in Mr. Vannet's report, that these are grey areas or matters of opinion.

I would submit that that is not so. If we are now acknowledging that it is necessary to vet adults to prevent those who are potentially harmful from having access to children, it must also be clear that behaviour which has caused children to be hurt or exposed to the risk of harm should be viewed seriously. The actions identified in the police reports demonstrated violence, cruelty and irresponsibilities towards and intimidation and exploitation of children. Hamilton's actions when he had children in his charge were not acceptable.

LORD CULLEN: Yes, Mr. Campbell.

MR. CAMPBELL: Sir, before a few concluding remarks I wish to say something very briefly about school security and the vetting of adults working with children but in very broad terms.

As far as school security is concerned, I/

I have nothing material to add to what is set out in the other submissions before the tribunal.

Risk assessment for every school and funding for identified improvements appears to be a common theme of many of those submissions and it may be thought that it is not beyond the wit of man to improve school security without turning schools into fortresses. It is of course difficult to say that school security measures would have stopped Thomas Hamilton when he was at Dunblane Primary School. At the best, it may have bought some time with the possibility of an earlier alert to the police force.

However, it may be worth giving some consideration in this context to the potential deterrent effect of improving school security so that they may not present such an apparently soft or easy target to would-be assailants.

So far as the vetting of adults working with children is concerned, plainly this is a very large topic and I am conscious that I have little, if anything, of materiality to add to what has already been said in this regard by others. However, perhaps echoing a theme raised by my learned junior, Miss Dunlop, a moment or two ago, it might be that some consideration does require to be given to what it is that one is trying to detect and what it is that one is trying to stop in any vetting procedure. No doubt paedophilia and presumably also incompetence as well as any other form of sinister motivation but this does raise the general question as to what is it that makes someone unsuitable to run such activities and what evidence, whether paedophilic tendencies, abnormal interests, incompetence or whatever, is required. I raise this question without having any easy answer to it but I note that Mr. McMurdo said that he dismissed Mr. Hughes' report partly at least because there were positive statements by some parents so if he had been in charge of vetting on Hamilton, would he have done anything about it?

What type of conduct is it that we are trying to vet and prevent? It is plain that many parents found Hamilton's conduct and deceptions, because he did indulge in deception of the parents, completely unacceptable and in other contexts a reasonable/reasonable parent test is sometimes employed.

Sir, all that I would add is that there may be some merit in considering a national means or method of co-ordinating information about peripatetic abusers and the like.

In/

12.20 p.m.

In the present case one can note that

Central Regional Council appeared to have little knowledge of the experiences of both Lothians and Borders and Fife Regional Councils regarding their letting of premises to Hamilton.

Lothian and Borders and Fife Regional Councils appear to have concentrated primarily upon removing Hamilton from their own areas. It follows that some national coordination of information may be of benefit.

In this context one notes that the Reporter to the Children's Panel does have a centralised secretariat covering the whole of Scotland, but part and parcel of considering the involvement of this body in the matter would involve the need to extend the Reporter's jurisdiction beyond parenting.

I turn, therefore, to my concluding remarks on behalf of those whom I represent. While I have spent some time explaining that Central Scotland Police could and should have identified Hamilton as unfit to be entrusted with weapons, in my submission it should not be thought -- it should not be thought -- that if the lessons of this particular case are learned all will be well in the future.

The circumstances in which harm can flow from guns are too many and too varied to permit such an approach. The opportunities for error or for failure to protect and identify an undesirable person will be endemic in any system of firearms licensing.

The culpability of Central Scotland Police should not divert Parliament from learning the wider lessons discussed in the earlier part of these proceedings.

Sir, I therefore end as I began. The Inquiry has dwelt on Thomas Hamilton for reasons which are right and proper. Now, however, the focus should return to the victims of his horrendous crimes.

We/

We will all recall the Lord Advocate's wholly appropriate reading out of the names of the dead and injured victims at the outset of this Inquiry. It is not for me to read them out again at the end. However, it is those names and their families, not that of Thomas Hamilton which are in all our thoughts.

To reflect on the victims and the consequences of Hamilton's crimes reinforces the urgent need to do all that is practical to prevent a recurrence, hence the families' call for a complete ban on the civilian ownership, possession and use of all types of gun.

If I may be permitted a brief reference to contemporary events, yesterday's appalling attack in Wolverhampton would probably have been much worse had the assailant been armed with a gun. The absence of firearms not only reduced the severity of the injuries sustained, but also allowed others to defend themselves and their children. These events reinforce the families' call for a ban on guns.

Sir, it only remains for me, on behalf of the families and on behalf of Mrs. Harrild and Mrs. Blake, to thank yourself, the Lord Advocate, the Crown Team, Mrs. McKeand and all others -- and I mean all others -- involved in the preparation for and the holding of this difficult Inquiry for the sensitive consideration which throughout has been given to the interests of the families and the injured teachers. This is something which has been greatly appreciated.

Further, while criticisms have been made as to certain conduct by certain people on the 13th March, both on the day itself and since then the families have received unstinting support and assistance from many people too numerous to mention. Again all of this is greatly valued.

Thank you, Sir, and unless I can assist you in any other way, that is all that I have to say.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you, Mr. Campbell, for your remarks.

Mr. Gibb, do you wish to address me now?

MR./

MR. GIBB: Nothing in any of our lives could have prepared us for the horrific events of the 13th March, and despite all of us living and working in a more violent society, the Dunblane tragedy touched everyone in Scotland, and indeed worldwide.

There are, however, key areas of concern which must be addressed following on the tragedy, and I take this opportunity on behalf of the Mayor family and on behalf of the teaching staff at Dunblane Primary School to make submissions on the key aspects addressed by you at the preliminary hearing.

You indicated at the conclusion of the hearing on the 28th June that you wished submissions and recommendations, and only submissions on the facts to which observations or comment might be directed.

There are several instances where there has been a conflict of evidence -- and Mr. Campbell has dealt with this. There is really only one on which I would wish to comment, and that is the Haggar/Reilly scenario.

I have to say while I think it would be very convenient and useful if I could say that I found that evidence to be credible and reliable, I have very considerable difficulties with the evidence. There was a considerable conflict of evidence between Mrs. Haggar and Mrs. Reilly. Mrs. Haggar made reference to the threat to burn her tent down on the part of Hamilton. Mrs. Reilly did not remember that.

Mrs. Reilly made reference to the threat with a gun on Inchmoan island, and as Mr. Bonomy, for the Crown, quite properly put it to Mrs. Reilly, there was no evidence from any other source with regard to that particular part of the evidence.

Clearly if there had been -- if the evidence of Mrs. Haggar had been supported by other evidence it would have put quite a different complexion on the subsequent actions both on behalf of Lothian and Borders Police and Central Scotland Police in their dealings with Hamilton.

But/

But while, as I say, it would be helpful if I could find some merit in the evidence, I myself find it difficult to see that there is reliability sufficient in this particular aspect for you, Sir, to make any findings in fact which could justify the view that there was knowledge on the part of the police of any complaints on the part of Mrs. Haggart.

Sir, much had been made during the Inquiry of the alleged defects in the administrative procedures contained within Central Scotland Police, and Mr. Campbell has dealt with that in very considerable detail, and in my submission I would simply endorse the remarks he has made.

Clearly the evidence of Chief Superintendent Millar and Deputy Chief Constable McMurdo requires to be considered in very considerable detail, and I would simply endorse the comments made and the detailed submissions made by Mr. Campbell with regard to the defects within Central Scotland Police.

While he majored on that, however, it was clear, in my submission, that there were defects further up than that. Indeed, in my submission the Home Office Guidelines were not helpful and lacked the clarity which one would have expected of such, and indeed you will recall evidence that even the training manuals prepared at the Scottish Police College at Tulliallan were defective in a crucial respect in respect of the test required under Section 27 of the 1968 Act, particularly with regard to the much-vexed question of unfitness to be entrusted with a firearm.

Before I come on to submissions as to the recommendations you should make, there is really only one remaining aspect with which I would wish to deal, and that relates to the events of the 13th March itself.

It is clear that there is a conflict of evidence, but I think the conflict over when parents were finally told, or the last set of parents, of the tragedy, was eventually supported -- they were supported by the social worker who gave evidence, and clearly the last parents were told at 3 o'clock.

Mr. Mayor was quite clear in his own recollection/recollection that he was left for half an hour before being told anything.

Perhaps the only lesson that can be learned from this particular aspect is that should such a tragedy ever occur again a senior police officer should immediately be delegated to have responsibility for communication with those directly involved in the tragedy.

Many of us learn that it is better to tell someone there is nothing to report rather than to tell them nothing at all. Indeed, sadly that happened on that day. I cannot begin to understand how these parents must have felt during the five hour period when they knew nothing.

I certainly understand how Mr. Mayor feels, and he feels that he was let down badly by the police force in the fact that he was left alone for half hour before he eventually had to get it out of the police that his wife had died; and indeed what is all the more surprising is that he and his daughter were within yards of each other for almost two hours before they were put together. But all I say is that one of the important considerations is that a very senior officer should be delegated, and that that should be part of the procedure from now on.

Turning now, Sir, to the recommendations which I would suggest you should make to others for consideration, it is the earnest hope and prayer of Mr. Mayor, his two daughters, and the entire teaching staff of Dunblane Primary School, that the outcome of this Inquiry in due course will be the complete ban on the private ownership or possession of handguns; and the view, both of the Mayors and of the teaching staff at Dunblane Primary School, is very much in line with the wish expressed by over 700 thousand members of the public who have been signatories to the Snowdrop petition.

That, therefore, is my primary submission, and nothing that I say with regard to alternatives should in any way be taken to deflect from the view of those I represent, namely that a complete ban is the only answer to prevent further Dunblanes happening.

LORD/

LORD CULLEN: Just to be quite clear, you align yourself with the call in the Snowdrop petition; is that right?

MR. GIBB: Yes. Notwithstanding the fact that my primary submission is that there should be a complete ban on the ownership and possession of handguns, it is appropriate that I should comment further in the event that such a proposal is not adopted in due course, it is important to emphasise in the first place that rather counter to the documentation we have seen and various reports to date, that ownership and possession of handguns should be seen as a privilege rather than a right given to members of society, and it should only be in exceptional circumstances and in the event that such members of society have entirely satisfied the appropriate regulators of the firearms legislations that they should be fit and proper persons to hold handguns.

Mr. McMurdo made some reference in his evidence to the right on the part of the members of the public to complain about things. Now, of course, in his capacity as Deputy Chief Constable, he was responsible for complaints, but it seemed to me that the general tenor of his evidence -- and that is supported by Mr. Millar -- was that in the event of a complete balance -- in other words, an application with some evidence to suggest that someone was unfit to be entrusted with a firearm, and even with a gut feeling on the part of police officers that there was an unfitness, that in that event the officers would feel bound to grant a certificate.

That was evidence given by Chief Inspector Millar and I think supported by Mr. McMurdo, and in my submission that is not the appropriate way, and in my submission in the future, given such a balance, if there is a gut feeling, then the appropriate procedure to be adopted should be to refuse.

LORD CULLEN: Just to be quite clear, does that involve a change in the statutory language?

MR. GIBB: Well, I am coming to the question of onus in a minute -- yes, I think it does involve a change in the statutory language.

If/

If matters are to proceed on the basis of continued ownership or possession of handguns by members of the public, subject to the necessary safeguards, then it is in my submission appropriate that the detailed submission put forward by the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland jointly with the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents and the Scottish Police Federation, and also supported by the submission by the police in England and Wales, should be followed, namely that such members of the public should only be entitled to hold .22 single-shot weapons.

Evidence has been led before the Inquiry as to the impracticability of conversion of semi-automatic pistols or revolvers to single-shot, and I would tend to accept the proposition that such conversion is impracticable.

Certainly it could be done, but the evidence appears to suggest that it could be undone, given the will of any to undo the restrictions.

As a consequence it follows that arrangements would require to be made for the surrendering of all weapons that do not comply with the requirement that they are limited to .22 single-shot. Reference is made in various submissions to the consequences of such a surrender from the point of view of an obligation on the part of Government to compensate owners of such weapons in the event of such a scenario, and much has been in submissions of the entitlement of shooters to make application to the Court of Human Rights as a consequence of the withdrawal of the right to continue to hold firearms, on the basis of the present law.

If the proposition finds acceptance that members of the public should be continuing to hold or possess firearms, in my submission it would not be appropriate that they should be held at home. In my submission it is appropriate that such weapons should be deactivated and a separate part of the weapon should perhaps be held at a registered Gun Club, and a separate part retained by the owner of the weapon. This would get over the difficulty over the possible theft of weapons held in a secure Gun Club.

I have to accept that if weapons in their entirety were to be held at Gun Clubs there are/

are significant difficulties.

First of all, the general impression I have is the existing Gun Clubs in operation would lack the necessary security to enable guns to be held on the premises. Secondly, the geographical location of such Clubs would militate against such storage, and this would be a particularly attractive situation for the theft of weapons. There is, of course, the additional difficulty that many Gun Clubs do not have their own premises.

The only other possibility that could perhaps be contemplated is that there could be a central storage area available within each police force, or indeed under the auspices of the firearms control body to which I will make later reference.

I do appreciate however, that standing all the evidence you have heard there are very considerable difficulties over such a proposition. But it is my submission that if ownership continues to be allowed then it is not appropriate that either the weapons themselves or the ammunition should be held within private premises.

Much has been made of the onus at the present time under the existing legislation. It has certainly been clear to me, and in my submission clear to the Inquiry, that the general tenor of the evidence is such that police officers find themselves in a difficult situation where there is no concrete evidence against an applicant either for a firearms licence or for renewal -- and I have made reference to the earlier evidence given by police officers, which has been supported by a gut feeling -- and they find a requirement to grant.

In my submission that is totally unacceptable and in any legislation passed as a consequence of this Inquiry it should be clearly spelt out that the onus should be on the applicant to satisfy the relevant authority as to his fitness to hold a Firearms Certificate, and it should be completely spelt out that there is no onus on the authority concerned to make any justification for their own findings or their own feelings as to whether or not it was appropriate that a certificate should continue to be held.

LORD/

LORD CULLEN: Just to expand that for a moment, if we look at Section 27, would the effect of what you are saying be to take effectively part of the proviso and put it into the leading part of the sub-section; is that right?

MR. GIBB: Yes.

LORD CULLEN: Leaving the remaining parts, that is to say unsound mind and intemperate habits, where they are?

MR. GIBB: Yes.

You/

12.40 p.m.

You, sir, endeavoured to try and get from Mr. Campbell just what Section 27 meant, but I am not going to put my head in that noose and try it.

LORD CULLEN: I think I cut you off.

MR. GIBB: In my submission, it is appropriate that the standard test for grant, renewal or revocation of a firearms certificate should perhaps be the same. It is quite inappropriate at the present time there is a difference in standard between the requirements for revocation and the requirements for grant or renewal, and indeed there is something to be said for the standardisation of the test both with regard to shotguns and all firearms.

In my submission it is appropriate that a formal power of suspension should be given to the relevant authority to enable a firearms certificate to be suspended immediately if there are concerns about the continuing fitness of a firearms certificate holder to hold a firearm pending any investigation. In the event of such a suspension it would be appropriate for the relevant authority to remove the firearm from the control of the certificate holder and keep them in a safe place pending the outcome of any enquiries. Clearly there may require to be some time limit on a suspension and if further steps are not taken by the police within a relatively short period otherwise the suspension would cease to have effect.

Much has been made during the Inquiry of the test for "good reason" in the Firearms Act 1968. Much has also been made of the fact that if "good reason" ceases to exist, such as for instance termination of membership of an appropriate gun club, then there is no power available to the police at the present time to revoke a licence and that clearly should be corrected in any subsequent legislation.

Again, so far as "good reason", much has been made of the fact the general tenor of the advice to the police at the present time is an applicant only has to show that he has an opportunity to use a firearm for target shooting. This/

This in my submission is quite inappropriate and it is appropriate that "good reason" should be more specifically dealt with in the legislation. It should be made clear that the actual use of the firearm would need to be established before renewal of a certificate may be granted.

Evidence has been led to the effect that it is not even necessary to produce a firearms certificate to purchase the constituent elements of ammunition or to purchase a magazine for use in a semi-automatic pistol. In my submission, production of a current firearms certificate should be a requirement before there can be any commercial sale of the constituent elements of ammunition or the magazine or indeed any parts of a firearm.

Turning now to the question of club procedure. We have heard earlier from the evidence that the actual use of firearms held under a firearms certificate would be necessary to constitute good reason as opposed to simple opportunity. In my submission, it is appropriate that gun clubs should be required to record the actual use of ammunition by their members at any time, to record the amount of ammunition purchased by each member of the club, and to keep a record of all self-made ammunition. In my submission, it would be appropriate at a club shoot for such information to be verified by means of each firearms certificate holder keeping a record book and the range officer, for instance, may be required to initial after the shoot the actual use of ammunition.

Evidence has been led to the effect that anyone can shoot at a club registered by the Home Office indefinitely without requiring the possession of a firearms certificate. In my submission, that is inappropriate. In my submission, whether or not one is shooting at a gun club with gun club weapons and using gun club ammunition, even if that club is registered with the Home Office, it is still appropriate that each person should hold a firearms certificate, subject of course to arrangements made for probationary members who might be entitled, clearly, who would clearly require to use firearms during their probationary period.

LORD CULLEN: What actually are you getting at there? What change are you effecting there/

there?

MR. GIBB: At the moment as I understand it if you shoot at a Home Office registered club you can shoot indefinitely, without a firearms certificate, and as I understood the evidence it was only at non-registered clubs that you can only shoot if you have a firearms certificate.

LORD CULLEN: I am not entirely sure about that. There are arrangements I think for guest days and there is a process when you start off and you intend membership. You are allowing for that. I am not sure that you can just come back repeatedly with no avowed intent to embark on the process of membership.

MR. GIBB: I may be wrong about that.

LORD CULLEN: We will no doubt hear from those whose knowledge is more vast than ours.

MR. SCOGGINS (British Shooting Sports Council): Mr. Gibb is right, it is not necessary for a member of a Home Office club ever to supply for a certificate.

MR. GIBB: Now turning to the Firearms Control Board. We have listened to a great deal of evidence with regard to questions which have arisen over the past five weeks as to whether it is appropriate that a Firearms Control Board should be set up quite separately from the police with the particular task of regulating those who hold firearms and also the disciplining of such people. In the thematic inspection report of H.M. Inspector reference is made to the fact that a Firearms Control Board was considered previously and was rejected on the grounds of cost. In my submission, that is not an appropriate consideration, quite clearly all the more so having heard the detailed submissions from Mr. Campbell of defects within Central Scotland Police. In my submission, it is now appropriate that a Firearms Control Board should be set up which Board would have responsibility for carrying out investigations and granting firearms certificates for all of those who wish to have them, and would also have a responsibility for disqualification procedures to which I will make later reference.

In/

In the event of such a Firearms Control Board being set up clearly its staff would require to have right of access to the Scottish Criminal Records Office, to the Police National Computer, to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre at Swansea, and also the local Criminal Intelligence held by the police force for the area in which they were operating. In my submission, whether or not the continuing Regulations are carried out by a Firearms Control Board or even to be carried out by the police, it is appropriate that whoever is involved should be given the statutory power to enter premises at which firearms are held without cause being shown. You will recall, sir, this was a factor at the moment and there is no power of entry available.

Turning now to the question of appeal procedure. I have referred earlier to the creation of a Firearms Control Board. In my submission, in the event of such a creation there should be a separate Tribunal set up to deal with questions of appeals relating to firearms matters. That appeal body should be quite separate from the Firearms Control Board and would consist of a legally qualified chairman and two other members one of whom would have knowledge of firearms. On the question of appeal, in my submission, the only ground of appeal would be whether the Firearms Control Board in exercising their discretion to refuse or to refuse to renew an application or to revoke a licence had acted unreasonably; it would not be open to the appeal body to substitute their own judgment. In the event that such a Firearms Control Board was not set up in my submission it is appropriate that there should be extension of the present arrangements with regard to the appointment of firearms examiners within individual police forces to deal with the whole question of the grant, renewal or revocation of firearms certificates.

Criticism has been made of the present arrangements from the shooting lobby in respect of police officers charged with the question of renewal have little knowledge of what they are doing. It could well be that such criticism is justified. In my submission, it is appropriate that if in fact firearms examiners are not appointed that there should be designated officers within individual police forces who would have a specific responsibility/responsibility to deal with applications for firearms certificates, renewals or revocations.

We heard evidence from WPC Anderson she was a community beat officer and this was either the first or at best second firearms renewal she had done and she had dealt with only a few shotgun renewals. She herself had some knowledge of firearms but there must be many police officers who have no knowledge of firearms whatever. In my submission, it is appropriate if any such person should be designated they should have appropriate training in the quite complex area of firearms law.

There was also a reference particularly by WPC Anderson that she would never have thought of going and knocking on the Deputy Chief Constable's door to express her views about Hamilton. Police forces always have been hierarchical and it is perhaps appropriate there should be a link in between the officer concerned with the investigation and the officer granting the certificates and that there should be direct access by the one to the other. Clearly WPC Anderson expressed her concerns to her superior but there is no evidence to suggest that Deputy Chief Constable McMurdo was ever aware of the concerns that the WPC had expressed about her anxieties about Hamilton at the time of her visit to the house in connection with the renewal.

Turning now to the question of counter-signatories or referees: we have heard evidence during the Inquiry about the abolition of the counter-signatory requirement in respect of firearms applications or renewals. In my submission, this is a retrograde step and it is appropriate in my view there should be two counter-signatories to each application. A protocol should be made available to such counter-signatories setting out the precise responsibilities and setting out the importance of the solemn obligations they are carrying out in supporting an application for a firearms certificate. It may be appropriate that in fact such counter-signatories should sign before a Notary Public or a Justice of the Peace thus emphasising the importance of the counter-signature on such a document.

Having listened carefully to all the evidence and particularly the evidence from the BMA, I/

I am not satisfied that it is appropriate that a general practitioner should be asked as a matter of routine to provide a medical certificate for each application for a new certificate or for renewal. It has been pointed out -- and indeed was so in this case -- that Hamilton had very little dealings with his GP over the years and indeed his GP knew nothing about him. At best all a GP can do, as put by Mr. Bonomy, was to provide a negative reference to the effect that the applicant was not unfit to hold a firearms certificate. It would be quite inappropriate to ask GPs to provide a positive reference and indeed it would be impossible for them to do so suggesting that an applicant was actually fit to hold a firearms licence.

Evidence has been led about the possibility of the role of the police surgeon in new applications or renewal applications and certainly such a proposal gets over the difficulty of the confidential relationship between GP and patient and the difficulty which a GP may find himself or herself in in the event of refusal to co-operate in the provision of a report for the purposes of obtaining a certificate. Certainly the independence of the vetting by a police surgeon gets over this difficulty.

As I understood it, it would only be in the event of any difficulty conceived by the police surgeon that any forensic psychological evidence would be required, and there was reference to the analogy of the driving licence records. It is clear to me, however, it is perhaps easier when you have perhaps epilepsy or diabetes, and in my submission it is much more difficult to deal with any mental illness or psychological difficulties to precisely pinpoint what these are. Clearly there is an obligation on the part of GPs to report, for instance, epilepsy and diabetes at the present time, but there is a difficulty in this and I think it is much more difficult for a police surgeon to properly assess the mental state of any applicant just solely from an application form.

Turning to the question of travel or travel with possession of firearms: we have heard evidence, particularly with regard to Hamilton's travels to various clubs and his travel to Linlithgow when he carried his weapons in public service/service vehicles. Clearly he would have committed an offence under the 1968 Act had he had ammunition with him. But in my submission it is appropriate that there should be a requirement that any firearm being carried in public should be properly secured and also in secure containers.

Turning now to the question of prohibited persons under Section 21 of the 1968 Act: there are of course presently prohibitions preventing those who have served a sentence currently of more than three years from ever holding firearms again, and those who have been sentenced to a period of detention of three months or more from holding a firearms certificate for a period of five years from the date of release. In my submission, it is appropriate that these prohibitions should be substantially extended. It would seem appropriate that in the event of a firearms certificate holder being convicted of any crime involving abuse of alcohol or drugs or involving the use of violence that there should be an automatic disqualification from holding or obtaining a firearms licence perhaps for a period of three years or more depending on the severity of such an offence, and again it may be appropriate that a Firearms Control Board should have a role in this.

Turning to the question of hollow point bullets; we had some evidence during the Inquiry. We have not heard any evidence which would justify the use of hollow point bullets for target shooting. In my submission, it is appropriate that hollow point bullets should be banned or banned for target shooting.

Turning now to the question of postal renewal: evidence has been led with regard to encouragement on the part of the Inspectorate that Forces move towards the question of postal renewal. In my submission, this is quite inappropriate, and indeed the evidence we have heard was to the effect many Scottish Police Forces have resisted such a move as inappropriate. In my submission, such a proposal should immediately be withdrawn and there should be a requirement at each renewal there should be a visit either in the form of a firearms examiner or a dedicated police officer and a much more detailed investigation should take place and a much more thorough and detailed enquiry of the applicant/applicant than presently takes place.

Turning to the question of false declaration: clearly there is a possibility of an applicant making a false declaration in respect of any matters relating to firearms. In my submission, it is appropriate that if such a false declaration is found to have been made that there should be provision for automatic suspension of a firearms certificate and power should be given to revoke a firearms certificate in the event of a false declaration having been made in either an application for granting a certificate or a renewal. Again there might be the possibility of appeal to the Firearms Control Board or Firearms Tribunal in the event of such a procedure having been adopted.

After/

2 p.m.

After an adjournment for lunch:

MR. GIBB: Sir, I would like briefly to deal with two other matters, first of all the vetting of those involved with children, and finally school security.

In terms of vetting procedures, they are of course completely separate areas, namely those adults involved with young people and what generally might be deemed as mainstream organisation; secondly there are those who use local authority facilities but are not involved in mainstream organisations; and thirdly there are those adults involved with children who neither use local authority facilities nor are in fact affiliated to any mainstream body; fourthly there are of course many, many situations in which there is a one-to-one relationship between an adult and child, for instance in terms of musical tuition and the like.

Much has been made in the various submissions made that there is no wish to discourage those who have a legitimate wish to give of themselves to the community in assisting with youngsters to be deterred from doing so because of unnecessary bureaucracy. On the other hand, clearly in light of the circumstances surrounding Hamilton, and his involvement with youngsters, it is appropriate that the question of protection of these youngsters be given consideration.

I would commend to the Inquiry the detailed submission made by the Scottish Standing Conference of Voluntary Youth Organisations. Its submissions are clear and concise, and relate to focussing on "Organised Youth Activity in Clubs".

It is clear that increased access should be available to anyone involved in the vetting of those involved with youngsters, and I accept the proposition contained in evidence to the Inquiry that some sort of charge may require to be made in light of the increased use which will be made of access to the criminal records held, and I can see no great difficulty about that.

With/

With regard to the use made of local authority premises by those involved in youth work and not involved in mainstream activities, it has been clear during the evidence to the Inquiry that the very fact that Hamilton used local authority facilities for his boys' clubs gave an added degree of credibility to his operation. Clearly that should not have been the case. Again, I would commend to the Inquiry the vetting procedures put in place by Stirling Council at its Community Committee on the 18th June, 1996. This incorporates a vetting procedure information pack, and has much to commend itself.

In my submission it is appropriate that such documentation should be issued nationally and that national guidelines should be available to a local authority in line with the proposals from Stirling Council.

In my submission it is appropriate that a general leaflet should be issued in all schools at least once a year, nationally prepared, warning parents with regard to the operation of youth clubs, and in particular the concerns that might arise, and particularly drawing attention to the fact that there should be more than one adult involved in such clubs, and that concern should be expressed if there is no management facility involving parents available. Hamilton deceived Central Regional Council in its requests for information on the management of his clubs, and on one occasion took along adults to mislead the Regional Council in relation to the involvement of other adults with the Dunblane Boys' Club, which replaced the Dunblane Rovers Group. It was suggested later on that Hamilton again had misled the local authority in indicating that he couldn't get parents together until he saw whether a club was going to succeed, what children were going to attend and what parents would therefore be in a position to assist on the Management Committee. In my submission it is not appropriate that any club should be set up unless before the event proper steps have been taken to involve members of the community on a management basis, and again this is something which should be considered carefully by local authorities in terms of vetting procedures for those wishing to use local authority premises.

Reference has been made in the paper for the Scottish Office and the attached annexes to the Children's/

Children's Act, 1989, which contains provision for the registration of supervised activities and holiday pay schemes used by children under 8, and the intentions of the Government to use the provisions of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, Section 1(a) to remove the children's registration and inspection requirements from people providing supervised activities used by children under 8 years and to relax the registration requirements or holiday pay schemes. In my submission it would be quite inappropriate that there should be a relaxation of the provisions of the Children's Act, 1989, and I support those who have been consulted and who have resisted such a change.

I have raised with various parties the question of compulsory professional indemnity insurance in connection with any schemes set up for the use of children. In my submission, it is appropriate that the law should prescribe that Public Liability Insurance is compulsory for any such scheme. That would provide (a) protection for the public in the event of any accident happening to children while under the supervision of adults in such schemes; and (b) would increase the possibility of vetting by an insurer, to satisfy the insurer that proper facilities were in place and to satisfy themselves as to the risk involved in insuring such a scheme.

I would submit that consideration should be given to at least setting up a local register of clubs involving children under the age of, say, 12. This would be particularly important for what I have previously referred to as non-mainstream activities.

In the event that any adult is convicted of any offence involving either physical violence in children or abuse of children, it should be open to the Court to make a Disqualification Order preventing such an adult from having any involvement with children either on a voluntary or a professional basis at any time in the future, or for any such periods as the Court deems appropriate. Breach of such an Order should be a criminal offence.

I submit it would be appropriate that if any adult wishes to set up any child-based activity outwith/outwith their home area, and they carry out operations within their home area, that a certificate of approval should be obtained from the local authority within their home area indicating that such a scheme had been vetted. That would have got over the difficulty of Hamilton involving other local authorities, and this problem is accentuated by the creation of many more unitary authorities as opposed to the limited number of regional councils which were previously in existence.

Some evidence was led about the relationship between School Boards, Area Officers of Local Authorities and Head Teachers with regard to the letting of school premises for outside activity. In my submission, it is appropriate that national guidance should be given to School Boards with regard to this particular aspect, and that responsibility for the letting of school premises should be the responsibility of the School Board and the School Board alone.

With regard to children's activities, in my submission it is appropriate that consideration be given to a requirement that there is a ratio prescribed as to the number of children per adult involved in such activities, and there should be a statutory requirement that at least two adults should be involved in any such activities.

Finally on this aspect, with regard to the question of professional qualifications for those involved in such activities, in any vetting procedures I would submit it is appropriate that any applicant would require to grant the necessary mandate to enable any qualifying body to provide a report if requested by a local authority.

Finally, much evidence has been led about the question of school security. Sadly, the events of the last 24 hours have shown how difficult it is.

All schools are different, and indeed it is extremely difficult to know just how any prescription could be made with regard to the level of security required for particular schools. There is such a diversity of school buildings, ranging from the four-pupil country school to the central city/city school educating many hundreds of children. My principal submission here is that there should be a statutory requirement on each school to carry out a risk assessment on school security, and for the risk assessment to be updated on a regular annual basis.

LORD CULLEN: Is there not already some responsibility?

MR. GIBB: There is a requirement under the Health & Safety Act, but I am saying or suggesting that there should be a risk assessment.

LORD CULLEN: Are we talking about personal security rather than the security of the buildings?

MR. GIBB: No, the security of the buildings.

LORD CULLEN: Obviously that is not dealt with within the Health & Safety At Work Act. If you are talking about persons, it is already there.

MR. GIBB: I am talking about the security of buildings.

Finally on this question of security, there is the question of violence to staff in the education sector, and that is a cause of considerable concern.

Clearly, sir, Hamilton perpetrated violence towards the staff in Dunblane. My understanding is that the guidance given by the Health & Safety Commission in its document "Violence to Staff in the Education Sector" has not been implemented significantly by local authorities yet, and I would encourage implementation of the advice given in the guidance.

Finally, it is for me to associate myself with the remarks made by Mr. Campbell at the conclusion of his submissions and to express my appreciation on behalf of the Mayor family and the teaching staff at Dunblane for the way in which this Inquiry has been conducted.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you very much, Mr. Gibb./

Gibb. Mr. Jones?

MR. JONES: Sir, on behalf of the parties I represent may I first associate myself with the expressions of sympathy and condolence which were voiced yesterday by my learned friend Mr. Bonomy.

Central Regional Council's dealings with Thomas Hamilton date back to 1982 and continue from time to time until the early part of this year. For the assistance of the Tribunal I have prepared a narrative of these periods, the factual content of which has been revised by my learned friend.

I understand, sir, that narrative was attributed to parties yesterday, together with summaries of Hamilton's dealings with Fife Regional Council and Lothian and Borders Regional Council, and I understand that my submissions and these summaries can be available to the public. In these circumstances, sir, I do not propose therefore to read my submissions out, unless you, sir, thought it was necessary for me to do so, and therefore unless there is anything I can elaborate on or assist on in answering any question, then I am quite content for the narrative to be left to speak for itself.

LORD CULLEN: I am not actually sure what arrangements have been made to make these available to the public. Perhaps you can advise me of that.

MR. JONES: Certainly I understand that the various narratives have been distributed to parties, and I had envisaged they would then be made available to the public in the same way that written representations were made available.

LORD CULLEN: No doubt that is quite sensible. I wasn't sure how far the matter had gone as far as the distribution was concerned. Presumably all that is required is to have some copies available for the Press and any member of the public who wants to read them. Mr. Bonomy?

MR. BONOMY: These are effectively written submissions, which would otherwise have been made orally, and in so far as any member of the public does wish to see them they can be made available./

available. They should be available in my submission for public consumption.

LORD CULLEN: I think arrangements should exist if they do not already exist. Presumably your solicitor has prepared your set. Can you see that your set is copied in sufficient numbers so that members of the public can see it? I don't know if anything needs to be done about the others. I suppose the others are in the same category.

MR. BONOMOY: Yes; and copies will be made available.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you. Mr. Taylor.

THE DEAN OF FACULTY: Sir, I have discussed the matter with my friend Mr. Taylor, and I think in view of the prospective lengths of submissions which I may make and which he may make, subject to your lordship's agreement I would propose to address you first of all.

LORD CULLEN: I take it you are wearing your Lothian and Borders hat?

THE DEAN OF FACULTY: I am wearing both, my lord.

LORD CULLEN: Perhaps you will tell me at which point you will change the one you are wearing.

THE DEAN OF FACULTY: I will. Hopefully it will be obvious.

I too would wish to associate myself and those instructing me and my clients with the expressions of sympathy made by my learned friend Mr. Campbell for the families of the deceased and injured victims.

Now, this submission is made both on behalf of the individual members for the Scottish Police Federation, who would be any officer from the rank of constable to chief inspector, and also the members of Lothian and Borders police, and as I have indicated to your lordship, I shall endeavour to make it clear as I go along for whom I am speaking.

The/

The submission does not address the question of recommendations for the future, because the position of both of my clients in that regard is covered by the joint submission by the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland, the Superintendents' Association and the Scottish Police Federation. However, I wish to make two submissions on the evidence. The first relates to members of the Scottish Police Federation serving with the Central Scotland police, and the second relates to Lothian and Borders police.

Each of these submissions I think can fall, or certainly the first submission in relation to the Scottish Police Federation can fall into two parts: first of all in relation to events leading up to the incident at the primary school on the 13th March. I would submit it is clear on the evidence that the individual members of the Scottish Police Federation were all operating within the approved system of Central Scotland Police in respect of the licensing of firearms held by Thomas Hamilton. At all times, these officers were acting within the course of their duties, and any shortcomings in the licensing of Hamilton's firearms and due to defects in the system or failure of senior management, or both -- any such defects are not the responsibility of any of the individual members of the Scottish Police Federation.

Having regard to the evidence and the assurance given by my friend Mr. Taylor (p. 1403B-D) in relation to WPC Anderson, as well as the submissions already made, I would submit that there is no basis for you to conclude that any blame or criticism should attach to individual members of the Scottish Police Federation in relation to the question of the licensing of Hamilton's firearms.

The/

2.20 p.m.

The second matter, still dealing with the federation members, relates to the events of 13th March, and again it is my respectful submission to you that there is no evidence which would justify a criticism of individual members of the Scottish Police Federation.

Again any shortcomings relating to the handling of the aftermath of the tragedy are procedural, and my learned friend Miss Dunlop has referred to the acknowledgement in the evidence that lessons have been learned by those responsible for devising and implementing procedures.

I understand that my friend Mr. Taylor's submissions will not seek to pass any responsibility from the Central Scotland Force and/or senior officers to more junior officers who are the individual members of the Scottish Police Federation in relation to these two issues. Accordingly, if you do ultimately find that you wish to criticise Central Scotland Police or any of its police officers in respect of any of these two matters, I would ask you to exclude from that criticism the individual members of the Scottish Police Federation serving with Central Scotland Police.

Turning to the second issue, which relates to the Lothians and Borders Force -- and for the rest of the submission I am wearing that hat. This relates to the evidence of Mrs. Haggart.

Again, Sir, my submission here is that there is no foundation in credible and reliable evidence to justify any criticism of Lothians and Borders Police, or any of its officers, in relation to the events leading up to the incident on the 13th March. By referring to "Any officer of that Force", I include senior officers or ranks above Chief Inspector as well as the individual members of the Federation.

As Mr. Gibb has said, if the incident involving threats by Hamilton, involving a firearm, had occurred, and furthermore if that incident was reported to Lothians and Borders Police, it would be a serious criticism of that Force if such an allegation had not been investigated. But in order to/

to deal with this matter you will require to consider the credibility and reliability of Mrs. Haggar. My learned friend Mr. Bonomy has advised the Inquiry that Mrs. Haggar's daughter would not have assisted the Inquiry in this regard, and therefore you should examine the evidence which was available to you.

It will follow from these introductory remarks that I do not share the view expressed by my learned friend Mr. Campbell of Mrs. Haggar, and it will be my ultimate position that her evidence is both unreliable and incredible and should be disregarded.

There are a number of discrepancies in the evidence of Mrs. Haggar when compared with other evidence, and my friend Mr. Gibb has already referred to discrepancies as between her and her friend Janet Reilly.

He alluded to the reason given by Mrs. Haggar for leaving the camp, and that related to an alleged threat and is to be found at Page 711A to B.

The threat was to the effect that Hamilton hoped that her tent didn't catch fire. There was no question of any gun. But when we look at Reilly's evidence the threat was not of that nature but was rather a threat with a gun (932B to C). Reilly, as my friend Mr. Gibb has already observed, did not remember any threat being made about burning the tent (933B to C).

Furthermore, in Haggar's evidence (714 and 715) the statement which she made at the time to Detective Sergeant McBain was put to her. That statement did not contain any mention of a threat by Hamilton of any nature. That omission from the statement is astonishing if there were indeed any threats.

Furthermore, the statement contained a different picture given to the police officer about the chastisement of a child, the assault, the alleged assault; and her position to the officer seemed to be that this was appropriate because the child who was chastised had been bullying someone else.

Now, /

Now, the change in direction when Mrs. Haggar came to give evidence about the camp in my submission must colour the way in which you consider her subsequent evidence, and in particular the evidence which she gave about the incident or the alleged incident involving the van.

Now, that alleged incident is dealt with by Haggar at Page 718 onwards, and she is quite clear in her evidence that at the time she was with Janet Reilly (718A). At 719D she said unequivocally that Janet was beside her at the garden gate.

But when we look at Reilly's evidence (935A), it is clear that she is saying something quite different. Hamilton was ready to drive away when she arrived.

What about the gun? Well, at 718D Haggar said she saw what must have been the barrel of the gun, and she explained that it was protruding through the open window. I think there was some mention of it being tapped on the window, and protruding through the open window by about 2 inches. It was the driver's window (720C).

According to Haggar in cross-examination (730C) Janet Reilly would have seen the bit of metal, the end of the barrel of the gun -- at least they would have been if they had been looking at the van, because they were standing at the gate. But again, that has to be contrasted with the piece of evidence which I have already referred to that Janet Reilly said that Hamilton was getting ready to drive away when she arrived.

But it is clear from Janet Reilly's evidence that she did not see any gun on this occasion (935D), and certainly there is no question in her evidence of seeing a piece of metal protruding 2 inches through the open window of the driver's side.

Another aspect that you may wish to consider, Sir, is the fact that about a week before Mrs. Haggar gave evidence it is clear that she had a telephone conversation with Janet Reilly, and in the course of that conversation part of the discussion at least related to alleged discrepancies in their evidence about this incident -- alleged discrepancies/discrepancies which had been drawn to the attention of Mrs. Haggar by the investigating police officers. That passage is to be found at 731 to 732.

But even if you go further into her evidence, it is quite clear that it just doesn't bear scrutiny. According to her following this incident she telephone Linlithgow Police Office -- and you find that at 722B, Sir.

She was asked about the approximate time of that, for reasons which will become apparent, and at 740 to 741 I think it is a fair reading of the evidence that that call must have been made somewhere between 3 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

Well, that again just can't be correct, because Linlithgow is a manned police station during day time. There are two pieces of evidence in that regard, and there is a slight conflict between them, but I think it proper that I should draw your attention to both passages.

First of all, there is Detective Sergeant McGrain, (Page 790), who has the station manned somewhere between 8 and 9 in the morning until 10 o'clock at night; and the other officer is Sergeant Carson, who is a sergeant there (824C), who has it manned from 8.30 a.m. to 9 o'clock at night. So there is an hour of difference at the end of the day, but whichever is correct it is quite clear that this is a manned station between the hours of 3 o'clock and 4 o'clock when this call would come in.

That then takes me to the investigation which was carried out following the press reports about Mrs. Haggar's claim about this incident, and in that regard I would refer you to D.C. Mitchell (Page 828 onwards). Now, he examined the logbooks of Linlithgow Police Station and found no record of this call.

It is fair to say that if the station was not manned the call would be diverted, and thereafter another entry would be made, but if the call was made between 3 and 4, as Mrs. Haggar would have it, there ought to have been a record in the log.

Furthermore, he examined the police notebooks, / notebooks, or certainly those notebooks which were still available, and your lordship will recall the practice of the officer handing in the notebook when it was completed and it being retained by the Force. From the notebooks which were examined, again there is no record of this complaint.

Now, I think it fair to mention that Mr. Lynch's notebook is missing for the period 12th May to 14th June of 1989. That is dealt with at Page 827B.

In my submission that is irrelevant because it does not appear to cover the relevant date of the incident. The Linlithgow Academy incident was on the 16th May in that year, and the alleged incident at the van was certainly before the incident at Linlithgow; and in that regard I would refer you to the evidence of Mrs. Haggar (723E), when she said that the last dealings which she had with Hamilton were on the 16th May at Linlithgow Academy.

Now, if this incident involving the van had occurred before the incident at Linlithgow Academy -- and I think we know it was after Inspector Keenan's first visit in January of that year -- it is strange, in my submission, that Mrs. Haggar did not mention the gun incident to Margaret Butterwick, the reporter who went to see her about the Linlithgow Academy incident in advance of that.

That is accepted by Mrs. Haggar (738 to 739), and it is dealt with by Mrs. Butterwick (838D onwards). Miss Butterwick was surprised to read of the alleged gun incident after the Dunblane incident on the 13th March.

It is clear from her evidence -- it is clear from Miss Butterwick's evidence -- that Mrs. Haggar had animus against Mr. Hamilton, that she blamed him for having ill-treated her son at the camp, and she was critical of the way in which he ran the camps; and that was the extent of her expression of concern. The purpose of contacting Miss Butterwick was to alert her, and hopefully a photographer, to her intention to throw material over Mr. Hamilton at the Academy with a view to being charged for that and bringing out her concerns in Court.

If/

If there were an incident relating to the gun and the van one might have expected Mrs. Haggar to mention it at that stage.

The first time this incident relating to the alleged gun in the van beside her house -- the first time that that is mentioned is the day after this tragedy, and you will recall Susan Ovenstone, another reporter in Aberdeen (Page 833 onwards) gave evidence about being asked to go and interview Mrs. Haggar, as did the representative from another national newspaper.

But to go back to the notebook, even if the notebook had been the notebook for the relevant day, the absence of Mr. Lynch's notebook is not relevant for another reason, and that is that Mrs. Haggar knew some of the officers, and she knew that Mr. Lynch had a scar due to a burn on his face. And she categorically stated that he was not the officer to whom she had reported the incident; she knew him and he was not the officer (743 to 744).

D.C. Mitchell interviewed or caused to be interviewed all the officers and examined or caused to be examined all the Productions, with a negative result.

Another piece of evidence that you may think significant is that of Sergeant Carson, who was a sergeant at Linlithgow, and he deals (Page 825 A to B) with the fact that not only was there no complaint to him, but also it was the sort of complaint that he would have known about in a small station such as Linlithgow.

That is not surprising, if you are contemplating someone presenting a gun in a public place and threatening a member of the public. That is something that one would expect the police to take very seriously indeed, and officers to recall, particularly in a small station.

There is also some confusion about the date of the alleged incident at the van. Mr. Gall, the newspaper reporter, said that Mrs. Haggar had stated it was August, although he thought it was 1989 (Page 846).

It is clear that he must be mistaken about/about the year, but he was certain that it was August. She, on the other hand, is clear that it was after Inspector Keenan's visit, which was in January of 1989. So having told Mr. Gall it was August, she is now clear it was the following January.

Furthermore, after Inspector Keenan's visit in January she accepted that he had spoken with her on the telephone, and yet again she did not mention the incident in relation to the gun at the van (742).

Now/

2.40 p.m.

Now, there is another strange piece of evidence in that in relation to the other incident of Hamilton taking guns to a house in Linlithgow and allowing the children to handle them and be photographed with them. The position of Mrs. Haggar is that she did not complain to the police about that (p. 744B) and yet when you look at D76L it is quite clear that there is a telephone report to Central Scotland Police of guns being in the house in Linlithgow and the children being photographed with them. It is also clear that the informant bears to be Doreen Haggar of the address where she stayed. She was aware of this particular incident because she said she knew the lady who had mentioned it to her. This lady apparently got to know her through the boys' club but she then sought to suggest that she did not know the address of the lady so she could not have provided that information to the police.

It is also clear that following that report, Central Scotland requested the assistance of Lothian and Borders Police and that matter was investigated. It is also clear from the investigations that the householders, the husband and wife, accepted that this had happened but they had invited Hamilton to the house and had asked him to photograph their children with the guns and that they were not complaining about this matter.

There was also evidence to the effect that the officers in the light of that were satisfied, not only by that explanation but also by the explanation that he had been transporting guns to a club

Now, if the householder was not reporting the matter, is it not astonishing that Mrs. Haggar's name and address appears on that initial report? In my submission, it is something which goes much beyond a coincidence and for whatever reason, whether it is the passage of time or whether it is her present illness, in my submission it may be that Mrs. Haggar has confused these two incidents, that she did indeed make a report about guns to the police but the only report that was made related to the guns in the house and that that was very properly investigated and you have/have the evidence of Sergeant McGrane about that.

Now, also in relation to that complaint you might think timing is significant. You will recall that the date on the document was the 20th May, whereas I think it is quite clear that there was a mistake in noting the date because the enquiries were actually carried out, on the face of it, before the report was made. You may also recall the incisive cross-examination by my learned friend, Mr. Campbell, who established that Fiona Kilpatrick felt that the day she was giving evidence it was in fact the previous day and she was the one who had noted the particular report but looking at the date I would ask you to accept that it was the 20th May the complaint was made and bear in mind that what had happened four days previously may be significant.

On the 16th May there had been an incident at the Academy and Mrs. Haggart was disappointed because Mr. Hamilton would not take any action against her, thereby frustrating her plan to expose him in Court. In my submission, the truth of the matter is probably that on the 20th May, frustrated by Hamilton's decision not to take any action, Mrs. Haggart decided to complain about the incident involving the guns and the children which had taken place several months before. Now, in my respectful submission, when you look at the evidence of Mrs. Haggart against the background which I have referred to, all the investigations which were undertaken, the fact that she denied making a complaint when all the evidence pointed to the fact that it must have been she who made the complaint relating to the guns and the children, and the various discrepancies to which I have referred, in my submission you cannot conclude that her evidence is reliable and indeed you may conclude that it is incredible.

Whichever the position, in my submission, sir, you would not be entitled to reach a view or reach a conclusion that the alleged incident she reported to the police, Lothian and Borders Police, had not been investigated and there is no reason whatsoever for criticising Lothian and Borders Police in this regard.

Again, sir, I would like to thank you for your/your courtesy.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you, Dean of Faculty. Mr. Taylor?

MR. TAYLOR: I think Mr. McEachran is also coming in in advance, subject to your approval.

LORD CULLEN: Well, I would like to be quite clear where we are going next. Mr. McEachran, do you wish to be heard next?

MR. McEACHRAN: Yes, sir.

LORD CULLEN: What about Mr. Scoggins, who is sitting beside you?

MR. SCOGGINS: I intend to speak tomorrow. Mr. McEachran I think has other commitments.

LORD CULLEN: Have you discussed between the two of you to what extent each of you requires to address me? It may be that what has been said so far would ask for essentially one response but maybe you want to divide it between the two of you.

MR. McEACHRAN: Well, I think I only have two points to make which I think I can make in five or 10 minutes and I think Mr. Scoggins has rather broader points he wishes to make.

LORD CULLEN: Well, I am content if you wish to address me for that period on matters which arise by way of response on the basis that the major response will come from Mr. Scoggins.

MR. McEACHRAN: I am very much obliged. Sir, I represent the Scottish Target Shooting Federation which is a Federation of Scottish Associations representing competitors in target shooting in Scotland.

We are most grateful to you for this opportunity of addressing the Inquiry. I would like to associate myself with what Mr. Bonomy said at the beginning of his address yesterday. It is of course a matter of particular sadness for all competitive shooters in Scotland that these events occurred/occurred on the 13th March because it puts our sport under threat.

We have, as you know, sir, submitted a preliminary submission and we have also put in a final submission and I don't intend to repeat those.

We would also like to take the opportunity to indicate that we do associate ourselves with the much more detailed submission, the final submission, made by the BSSC.

I would like this afternoon to pick up two points. The first is the suggestion from Mr. Campbell that there is a well-established link between gun access and gun crime. On page 2927 of the transcript he referred to Annex G of the Home Office Secretary of State for Scotland evidence. He also referred to a late submission by Professor Gabor I think from Canada which has got the FAX date of the 4th July 1995.

LORD CULLEN: Just for the record, I think it is not technically a submission. It has been placed in a library which I have for reference purposes. I think that is the present status of that document but please proceed. For the record, that is what it is.

MR. McEACHRAN: Right. Well, I would suggest that there is no such well-established link. I would first of all refer you to the very powerful critique and the statistical evidence in the written evidence of Mr. Jan Stevenson which is Production 139 of the written submissions. I would also refer you to Richard Mundy's shorter submission in Production 87 and Colin Greenwood's evidence in his written submission in Production 60.

In my submission, they all point in the same direction, which is that the evidence, the rather short and scanty evidence, put forward by the Home Secretary is really not borne out by the references which he refers to which is some Canadian study and a study taken by telephone.

What I would like to ask your lordship to look at in Jan Stevenson's evidence is a passage which might be of interest to this Inquiry and I am just giving this as an example because I think it has/

has been given already. At page 25 he refers to the addressing of a meeting of the National Academy of Science in America in 1990 by a respected criminologist who had been studying firearms control policy and what Professor Kleck said, and this is quoted by Stevenson, is "When I began my research on guns in 1976, like most academics, I was a believer in the 'anti-gun' thesis, i.e. the idea that gun availability has a net positive effect on the frequency and/or seriousness of violent acts. It seemed then like self-evident commonsense which hardly needed to be empirically tested. However, as a modest body of reliable evidence..... accumulated, many of the most able specialists in this area shifted from the 'anti-gun' position to a more sceptical stance" and then moving down six lines, he says "(subsequent research) has caused me to move beyond even the sceptic position. I now believe that the best currently available evidence, imperfect though it is (and must always be) indicates that general gun availability has no measurable net positive effect on rates of homicide, suicide, robbery, assault....." etc. In my submission, the evidence submitted by Mr. Mundy and Mr. Greenwood is to the same effect.

Now, the next point I would make about Mr. Campbell's submission relates to the evidence which was given before the Home Affairs Consultation Committee in May of this year which your lordship may be aware of but I don't think has yet been made officially. The best summary of that that I have been able to find also occurs in Mr. Jan Stevenson's evidence at page 48. I think page 47 is the page I am looking at but he summarises over three or four pages what happened at that Inquiry and in particular he highlights the evidence from the Association of Chief Police Officers, I think that would be ACPO England and Wales, represented by their President, Mr. Sharples. Mr. Sharples indicated first that 96 per cent of the estimated crime takes place with firearms which are not licensed. Secondly, he was asked, and this is page 47, by one of the MPs if banning guns would make any difference and Mr. Sharples replied that it would not. He said as far as he was aware that the Regulations in this country were tighter than in any other.

Thirdly, in contradiction to my learned friend/friend, Mr. Campbell's, submissions I would refer to what Colin Greenwood says in his written evidence. This is Production 60 and I am looking at paragraphs 46 to 48 and also paragraph 70, where he indicates that because of the various Firearms Acts there has in fact been a reduction in the number of licensed firearms in this country but he points to the very high increase in armed crime and particularly armed robbery and he takes from that, in my submission, what is self-evident, that if the number of licensed firearms are down and there is a firearms crime increase by 500 per cent, there can be no valid link between gun access and gun crime and one has to look at the pool of unlicensed firearms in this which no amount of regulation would bring to an end.

So I would suggest when one looks at this evidence that Mr. Campbell is not well founded when he says that there is a well-established link between gun access and gun crime.

LORD CULLEN: There is one other source, and I am not sure whether it is mentioned by the Government or not, but he had referred to Professor Cooke who had I think referred to two studies, one of which was the Seattle/Vancouver comparison. Maybe that is covered by Annex G. I can't find the number.

MR. McEACHRAN: Yes, the Vancouver/Seattle comparison is dealt with also by Stevenson in his critique which makes the point that there are a number of other factors which were not taken into account in that comparison and one is the nature of the population and I would just refer to what Mr. Stevenson has said in his written evidence. As I say, it is a very powerful critique and it puts the whole of the evidence in doubt. That is why I refer to what Mr. Sharples said to the Home Affairs Committee because I think if the police felt there was any validity in this they would be saying so, particularly to a Parliamentary Committee.

Now, the other point I would like to put before you, sir, is this; my learned friend Mr. Gibb, made a number of points on behalf of the teachers in what I might call his secondary submission. I think his primary position was that there should be a total ban but he then went on to deal with what should happen if there was not such a ban/ban.

Now, we have urged this Inquiry that safety matters are best dealt with by concentrating on licensing of the individual to be a holder of a firearm and the best safety results would be go by going down that route. Now, I don't intend to repeat those submissions but Mr. Gibb made a number of recommendations as to what he said should happen after an applicant had cleared the licensing hurdle. In other words, we say the licensing hurdle is the one to promote safety and Mr. Gibb says well, if you get over that, there are other things that should happen. There should be ammunition registers at clubs, there should be central storage of weapons, there should not be storage in the home and there should be no hand-loading at home. A number of matters.

What I would like to suggest on behalf of competitive shooters in Scotland is that these recommendations are perhaps put forward without any real understanding of how shooters and clubs in Scotland operate. In the first place, no recognition seems to have been taken of the requirement for every firearms holder in Scotland that his firearm is stored in what is called secure storage and that means nowadays that every firearms certificate holder will have a steel cabinet of some form in his home which provides a separate storage for the firearm, ammunition and a bolt if it is a rifle. I don't think this Inquiry has heard any evidence to suggest that there has been much theft from such secure storage in the home.

Now/

3 p.m.

Now, the next point I would like to make -- and this is based to some extent on the evidence of Mr. McCarthy -- is that Scottish clubs do not all have facilities for storage. There are a number of clubs which use MOD ranges which have no club facilities themselves, and a requirement that ammunition and weapons were to be stored in such a place would mean that they could not exist.

LORD CULLEN: Mr. McEachran, these are all familiar arguments that have been made a number of times by those representing shooting interests. You can take it that I do appreciate that point.

MR. McEACHRAN: Perhaps, then, moving it forward, it is a question of building these up, because particularly in Scotland it is felt that to impose a requirement of a storage of weapons and ammunition centrally -- I notice the police for instance do not wish to be responsible for this -- would really have the effect of bringing competitive target shooting to an end, because there would be a requirement as I see it for a considerable expenditure of money to either build new storage facilities or to upgrade such facilities as exist. Your lordship has heard evidence of clubs in rural areas 50 years old, wooden or stone built. These would probably not be regarded as properly secure for a large number of firearms.

What the shooting community in Scotland is concerned about is that if such suggestions are put forward without any knowledge or any attempt to assess the cost element a recommendation could be made without any real evidence being given as to what it would cost the shooting community to try and bring these requirements into force; in other words, banning competitive shooting in Scotland by the back door. This matter I do not think has been dealt with in evidence, and we are anxious to put it before the Inquiry, and to suggest that such suggestions are made without proper knowledge. That is as far as I would like to take this point.

I am most grateful to you, sir, for allowing me the opportunity to address the Inquiry.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you, Mr. McEachran. Now/

Now Mr. Taylor.

MR. TAYLOR: Thank you, sir. Like those who have gone before me could I start by associating myself and my clients with the introductory remarks made by Mr. Bonomy, and I would wish to convey on behalf of my clients our sympathy and condolences to those who have suffered in any way by the events of the 13th March.

Sir, the submissions I am about to make to you can be split into several parts, and it may be of benefit if I outline the way I propose to deal with it.

The first section I propose to deal with relates to the events of the 13th March, 1996, and I propose to deal with that in relatively short form; the second section is to look at Mr. Thomas Hamilton himself; the third section is to look at the law and practice relating to firearms; the fourth is in relation to the Firearms Licensing Procedures for Central Scotland Police, which hereafter I shall refer to as CSP; the fifth relates to the decisions to grant, review and vary Hamilton's firearms certificate; the sixth relates to the culture in which decisions fall to be made; the seventh relates to what flows from any alleged shortcomings. I had intended to address you, sir, on the credibility and reliability of witnesses, but that has already been gone over by the learned Dean of Faculty, so I do not propose to say anything further in that regard.

LORD CULLEN: I have before me written submissions which are some 104 pages long. Are you going to adopt these to an extent without requiring to read them, or what is your plan of campaign?

MR. TAYLOR: I was not proposing to adopt them without reading them. I don't propose to read them verbatim all the way through. There are certain parts, particularly when one reaches the decisions, which perhaps can be taken in shorter form than is set out there.

LORD CULLEN: But effectively you will be following the order. I can see there eight chapters.

MR./

MR. TAYLOR: It is now down to seven.

LORD CULLEN: So you think you will be following the order set out in this document, using the document to supplement what you are saying orally?

MR. TAYLOR: That is so, sir.

LORD CULLEN: Right.

MR. TAYLOR: The tragic events of the 13th March have no precedent in this country, perhaps not in the world. Those present or called to Dunblane Primary School in the course of their duty that day, whether teachers, medical staff or police, were faced with what Mr. Taylor described as ".....a scene of unimaginable carnage.....one's worst nightmare", (Day 2, p. 157).

The Inquiry has not heard the detail of the horror which faced those entering the school gymnasium that day. The testimony of those present and the analysis of how Mr. Hamilton behaved in the gymnasium can give only the briefest insight into the impossible circumstances in which those people found themselves. As Mr. Taylor said, we who were not there cannot imagine. However, when considering the action of those called to deal with the events of 13th March it is essential to remember the awful and distressing circumstances in which they worked.

CSP received Mr. Taylor's call for assistance at 9.41 a.m., and the first police officers arrived at about 9.50. By 10.10 senior police officers were on the scene, the Chief Constable being one of them. He then delegated various tasks to his Commanders. Detective Chief Superintendent Ogg was then appointed as the officer in charge of the criminal inquiry.

The task which faced him, sir, was immense, and the Chief Constable immediately declared that this would become a major incident, and the appropriate procedures were set in place.

It was the responsibility of the police to ensure the speedy removal and treatment of the injured, to identify the dead, to inform the families/families of the dead and injured, to deal with the 800 other pupils at the school and their teachers, to reunite pupils with their parents, to secure the school perimeter, to handle the crowds arriving at the school, to control the world's media which quickly descended upon the school and to initiate a criminal inquiry (Ogg Day 1, p.138; Holden, Day 2, pp.188-189). In the course of the day, over 100 police officers were involved in handling the emergency. That has to be set against a total complement of 658 police officers in the Force.

All efforts within the gym in the first hour were to evaluate the injured and to ensure that all those who needed treatment received it as quickly as possible. The priority at that time was to get the injured to hospital as quickly as possible, and as a result of the efforts, all of the injured children were removed between 10.15 a.m. and 11 a.m.

With the greatest of respect to the parents, it is submitted that this decision was correct. The saving of life must be paramount.

In the course of the evacuation to hospital the names of the children were not noted. This was a deliberate decision, as it was felt that the injured should be left entirely in the hands of the medics and paramedics, and any police intrusion would be insensitive.

In making the decision not to note the injured children's names before evacuation, the police officers that their names would be noted at the hospital and relayed to them through the Casualty Bureau, a tried and test system. The communication problems which arose that day were not anticipated. I will not rehearse them here.

As a consequence of these difficulties, no information was received from the hospital until some time between 12 noon and 12.30 p.m. Had the communication problems been anticipated, a different approach would have been taken. If, God forbid, a similar event occurred tomorrow and no encrypted radios were available the names of the injured would be noted before they were taken to hospital.

It was suggested by Miss Dunlop yesterday/yesterday that a policeman might have been despatched to the hospital. This clearly would have been possible, but that is viewed from hindsight and without the trauma of the day bearing in on the decision makers.

After the injured were removed the dead had to be identified. Mr. Taylor explained that as soon as the question of identification was addressed "We realised.....the difficulty that the identification would give because of the scene in the gym and because of the fact that the class teacher was not available to us (Day 1, p.62).

Nursery teachers who had taught some of the children the previous year were asked to assist in the identification. The process was necessarily slow. The circumstances were extremely distressing. As Mr. Taylor stated (Day 2, p. 163), this was "A most harrowing time for the staff involved. We had to take the staff in and out of the gym on several occasions".

It was not just the teachers who were adversely affected. Mr. Ogg also described how police officers were crying. The other difficulties regarding identifications are set out in the transcripts, particularly in the evidence of Ogg, Holden and Taylor.

The paramount concern of all the officers involved in the process of identification and informing families was to ensure that the identifications were 100% accurate. One can only imagine what anguish there would have been had parents been told their child was dead when it later transpired that it was alive; or worse, to tell parents that their child was alive only later to find that it was dead, and the original information had been wrong.

That was the dilemma facing the police: balancing the parents' natural need to know and their desire to give only accurate information. That is not in any way to suggest to what the parents went through in the period they had to wait for information was other than an ordeal. It must have been, and it is acknowledged as such.

As was indicated yesterday, the police officers/officers in charge did think the identification had been completed by just after 12 noon. It was then that they were told that one identification was wrong, and this caused their confidence in the other identifications to be undermined, perhaps a not unreasonable position, and it was for that reason that the information was not at that stage imparted to the parents.

In his submission this morning Mr. Gibb made reference to the position of Mr. Moffat. Sir, I do not propose to address you in detail on that. I would just refer you to the transcript of Mr. Moffat (Day 8, pp. 1013-4). It is always a feature of such disasters that the media arrive on the scene at a very early stage. If cameras were to be kept away from the scene of crime a cordon was essential. Intrusion of such a nature would be unthinkable. However, it should not be thought that the constitution of the cordon delayed the task of getting the injured to hospital or thereafter identifying the deceased. The different tasks went ahead simultaneously. However, Mr. Holden accepted in his evidence that with hindsight the cordon could have been moved back a bit, and this would have afforded him the opportunity to speak to the parents out of the gaze of the Press.

The media did cause problems on that day. Naturally, they wanted to know how many had died. We heard that there was a figure of 12 broadcast, which caused embarrassment to a police officer who at the time did not know the number. The figure of 12 did not come from the police. The police suspect that they know the source, but it was not thought profitable to explore this at the Inquiry.

The setting-up of the liaison team was thought to be the most sensitive way of breaking the news to the parents. It was done with the best of intentions. It was thought that to derive maximum benefit in the long term the team required to be present at the outset. Again it was a balancing exercise.

It is submitted that the officers involved on the day of the 13th March made a number of judgments in very difficult circumstances and on the basis of the information available at that time. It/

It is submitted that given the circumstances their judgments were reasonable, albeit viewed with hindsight one might change some of these. Lessons can always be learned. These will be addressed, and you, sir, will be given details of this I hope if not today, tomorrow.

I would now like to address you, sir, on Thomas Hamilton. The evidence led on his character should be viewed in my submission with great caution. Reliance should be placed on it only where it is absolutely necessary for you to make a finding.

This submission, sir, is based on several planks. In the first place it is improbable that a properly-balanced picture of Hamilton can be constructed, given the horrendous deed perpetrated by him on 13th March. The natural inclination of many must be to deny their erstwhile friendship.

Secondly, as was explained by Professor Cooke (Day 23, p.2711), there is a natural human tendency after dramatic events such as those of the 13th March to have a distorted recollection of the man. Witnesses may well be selectively recalling parts of Hamilton's behaviour to make such facts fit with the events of 13th March and how Hamilton behaved on that day.

Thirdly, there has been no contradictor. For perhaps very obvious reasons, neither Hamilton nor his family were represented here. It is not being suggested that witnesses were deliberately misleading the Inquiry in any way, or deliberately lying; but given the second consideration mentioned above their recollection in the witness box is quite likely to be distorted.

It follows from the foregoing that the picture painted of Hamilton is probably blacker than he actually was. It also means that attempts by psychologists and psychiatrists to construct profiles of Hamilton are suspect for want of proper base information.

A further factor which must hamper the psychologists and psychiatrists is that they must assume that what the witnesses have said in the witness/witness box is entirely accurate and truthful.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, however, some witness did recollect Hamilton in a positive light. Francis Cullen (Day 5, p.584) described him as a generous man to work with and a kind man. Ewen Anderson (Day 5, p.593), described him as a very quiet, kind individual. David McDonald (Day 3, p.287) thought of him as an intelligent man and, although eccentric, interesting to speak to. On the other hand, other witnesses formed a different view. "Boring", "uninteresting", "eccentric", "loner", "unstable", "weirdo" are just some of the politer adjectives and nouns used in connection with him at the Inquiry. Just what was meant by these labels was not always made clear.

For/

For example, when Mr. Cole (Day 17, p. 2138), called him a loner, he meant that he didn't join in the talk. Mrs. Anderson (Day 23, p. 2811) also agreed that he was a loner, and meant thereby that she did not think Hamilton had many social contacts.

Professor Cooke (Day 23, pp. 2712 and 2714) used these labels to support his findings, but thought a loner was somebody who did not have "quality relationships". Yet Mrs. Anderson considered Hamilton's relationship with her to be one of friendship. They talked about topics of conversation as one would with a neighbour (Day 23, pp. 2810 and 2811). From her evidence it could be said that she and Hamilton enjoyed a quality relationship. Yet had she given her evidence earlier in the Inquiry and been asked only for a description of Hamilton she might well have said he was a loner, without any qualification. This label might then have been used to support a view of Hamilton which she would not have agreed with. A different definition of "loner" would have been attached to the label.

Clive Wood, for example, was never asked to comment on the quality of his relationship. He might well have given valuable evidence in this regard. When Mr. Wood was in the witness box it was not known to the parties that there was an intent to use the information on character as a basis for analysis by a psychologist and psychiatrist. Generally when witnesses applied labels they were not asked to explain what they meant.

It is therefore submitted, Sir, it is questionable what weight can be attached to the psychological/psychiatric profiles.

There are other reasons for calling the profiles into question. The analysts started by knowing that their subject had a mental deficiency or imbalance, or at least something out of the ordinary, and they were working backwards from a given.

Normally they require to examine a subject/subject and then make a diagnosis without the guarantee of knowing that there is in fact something wrong with their patient (Cooke, Day 23, p. 2172).

In order that Mr. Baird could prepare his second supplementary report, a statement was read to the Inquiry of an anonymous witness. It is difficult, in my submission, to ascertain what value that statement can have. It is respectfully submitted that to give it any weight whatsoever would be to do the witness a credit not justified. Not only was the statement introduced with the caveat that it was anonymous and that the witness had declined to attend, it was further stated by the learned Advocate Depute that the witness had convictions for dishonesty and parts of the statement capable of corroboration could not be so corroborated. It is submitted that its terms should be ignored.

Professor Cooke acknowledged that in preparing his profile what he was doing could only be regarded as -- I quote -- "slightly informed speculation after the fact" (Day 22, p. 2690).

It is respectfully submitted that your findings should not be influenced by evidence built on such a flimsy base.

I would now like to turn to look at Hamilton and his relationship with violence. I would start by posing the question as to whether there was anything in his behaviour which ought to or would have alerted a psychiatrist that Hamilton was to be a danger with a firearm.

There is no evidence of literature written from a psychiatric perspective to assist in this task. I do not believe that there is any.

The best that one can do in my submission is to look to established predictors of violence to ascertain if they are present in Hamilton, or were present in Hamilton. The best predictor of future violent behaviour is a past history of violent behaviour.

Other factors which can assist in such predictions are the abuse of drink or drugs; further, if an individual has problems in managing his/his anger, for example does he react with physical violence to insults or differences of opinion -- then that is a further predictor. Youth seems to be more disposed to violence than older persons. Males will commit acts of violence more frequently than females. The evidence in support of that came from Dr. Baird yesterday.

If one then seeks to apply these criteria to Hamilton, it is submitted that a very low probability rating would have been given to Hamilton had he been psychiatrically assessed for a propensity to be violent -- and I accept that as being distinct from holding a firearm.

Save for the two incidents at the summer camps in 1988 and 1991, there is not the slightest suggestion that Hamilton perpetrated any act of even mild violence.

His ability to control his anger was tested on several occasions, and some tests were severe.

The most extreme was probably when he was covered in flour, etc. and, as Mrs. Haggart put it "kicked up the backside" as he left one of his boys' clubs. It would appear that not only would he not make a complaint against Mrs. Haggart, but there is no evidence suggesting he even lost his temper (pp. 724-725).

George Robertson, the Member of Parliament, described his wife being angry with Hamilton and confronting him. Hamilton remained calm. Mr. Robertson's evidence was: "Our recollection of Thomas Hamilton was of a man, even from other anecdote, who even when confronted could remain calm" (p. 1802).

Mr. Robertson also described another parent cross-examining Hamilton in 1995 in what Mr. Robertson described as "a very very aggressive way", and in spite of great hostility and provocative questioning, he at no time reacted strongly. So Mr. Robertson thought that he "had no indication that this was a man who was bottling up any ferocious, murderous instinct. That was not something which crossed our minds".

It/

It didn't cross the mind of Mr. McMurdo either. Both he and Holden met with Hamilton in 1989 and 1993 respectively. Both remarked on how controlled Hamilton remained (Day 12, p. 1467 and Day 7, p. 875).

Throughout the Inquiry no witness has said that Hamilton lost his temper, save for Mrs. Haggart (Day 6, p. 718). It is submitted that she is not a credible witness.

At the age of 44 Hamilton could hardly be described as a youth.

About the only indicator which Hamilton fits is that he was male, albeit a male described from time to time as effeminate, the reference for that being Crawford (Day 4, p. 414); McMurdo, (Day 12, p. 1511); and Wilson (Day 3, p. 378).

It is submitted that viewed from the position of a psychiatrist there would be no reason to believe that Hamilton was a man predisposed to violence. If a psychiatrist would in all probability have formed that view, there is no reason to believe that a Chief Officer of Police should have come to a different view.

Properly analysed, Professor Cooke's evidence reaches the same conclusion. On page 2677 the professor, from the information which he had, excluding the events of 13th March, did not think he could have predicted that Hamilton would have been a risk.

If I could now turn, Sir, to consider the aspect of personality disorder, on page 2682 when considering whether Hamilton had a sadistic personality disorder, Professor Cooke thought there was some evidence, but insufficient to be absolutely certain.

In his report and subsequent evidence Professor Cooke considered that certain elements of the evidence led suggested that Hamilton may have suffered from a sadistic personality disorder, as defined in DSMIIIR. The factors which Professor Cooke said supported this finding are set out in his report from page 8 to the second paragraph on page 9 (Day 3, p. 2715). In the evidence there narrated Hamilton/

Hamilton was said to have become amused or obtained pleasure from suffering.

The first piece of evidence which is said to support the view that Hamilton gained pleasure from the psychological suffering of others is in relation to the telephone calls which were made to his mother in respect of her diabetes. Hamilton suggested she would have to go to Inverness for attention. This had distressed his mother. However, there is no suggestion in the evidence that he was amused or gained pleasure from this.

Mrs. Sutherland (Day 2, p. 206) put it down to schoolboy humour.

Another instance is said to involve Hamilton's former neighbour, Grace Ogilvie. Professor Cooke states that Hamilton had deliberately frightened Mrs. Ogilvie when she was hanging out her washing. A scrutiny of the transcript (Vol. 3, p. 276), where the incident is recorded, makes no suggestion that what Hamilton did was deliberate, nor that he gained any amusement or pleasure therefrom.

The report goes on to rely on Hamilton keeping his adoptive father outside his house at night for up to 20 minutes, as spoken to by Mr. Deuchars. In his statement to the Inquiry (Day 2, p. 208), there is no record made of this incident by Mr. Hamilton Snr. Had it been of significance or remembered, one might have expected him to tell the police of it.

We also have the evidence on Day 2 (pp. 204 and 207) from Mrs. Watt and Mrs. Sutherland respectively to the effect that the adoptive father had a drink problem. It is submitted that that fact alone could provide a perfectly plausible explanation as to why the father was kept out at night. It could also explain why such an apparently significant event has not been recalled by him. Indeed it might also give a completely innocuous explanation for why Mr. Hamilton complained that his son took over the whole house, moving the adoptive father's personal possessions, etc., into one room.

The final piece of evidence relied upon by/

by Professor Cooke, and on which I would seek to comment, is the incident when James Gillespie had a gun pointed at him by Hamilton, which incident is described on page 351 of Day 3. Again there is nothing in the transcript to suggest that amusement or pleasure was derived by Hamilton from this action.

The conclusion which is reached by Professor Cooke is that on balance there is insufficient evidence to make an absolute diagnosis. Given the evidence just narrated, he was able to conclude, however, that there were significant traits.

It is respectfully submitted that the evidence comes nowhere near demonstrating facets of Hamilton's behaviour -- by that I mean the amusement or pleasure from suffering -- which Professor Cooke states are necessary in order to constitute evidence of a sadistic personality disorder. All of the incidents are just as susceptible to an explanation which would not give rise to a conclusion that Hamilton had a sadistic personality disorder.

Also in support of the conclusion that there are some traits of sadistic personality disorder, Professor Cooke relies upon the video tape. He draws one conclusion from having seen it. He relies upon the evidence from somebody he describes as "a physical education expert" to say that the boys were pushed far beyond their abilities.

The only person who has given evidence with any training in physical education, as far as I could ascertain, is Mr. Boal, who gave evidence on Day 14, and said (p. 1470) that he was an under-graduate student in sport in the community, a position which hardly merits the title of "physical education expert".

Dr. Baird wondered if Hamilton might have destroyed pornographic material. If so it may be thought surprising that the collection of videos remained, if Hamilton did consider them to be pornographic.

Dr. Baird considered the possibility of Hamilton suffering from a sadistic personality disorder/disorder, but thought the evidence in support could only be described as of a minor degree. Although he thought that some of the characteristics could overlap with a psychopathic personality disorder, it does appear that those aspects which Professor Cooke relied on to make his diagnosis, as set out in the Report and in evidence are distinct from the aspects Dr. Baird relied upon. The behavioural aspects may have overlapped, but in fact they didn't.

Professor Cooke discounted the possibility of Hamilton having a psychopathic personality disorder. He scored him as having six points when 18 would be needed. Dr. Baird considered that he did have such a disorder.

What one therefore has is a situation where two experts disagree. Given that one has already indicated that what he was doing was speculating after the fact, it is submitted that it would be unsafe to conclude that Hamilton did suffer from any personality disorder.

There was, however, agreement between the experts that he did not have a mental illness.

Even, however, if Professor Cooke is correct in his diagnosis of Hamilton having such a disorder, none of the aspects which constituted his reason to believe he was so suffering could have or should have been known to Central Scotland Police.

However, both Dr. Baird and Professor Cooke considered Hamilton to be a paedophile.

Again, in my submission, there is no evidence before you which would entitle you to conclude that Central Scotland Police should have been able to make that diagnosis of him. Most of the information upon which Dr. Baird relied in the transcripts to support this conclusion was information not known to the police. These aspects are set out in the supplementary report he prepared.

In any event, even if by some process the police ought to have been aware of Hamilton being a paedophile or of having such tendencies, ought that to have led them to the view that he should not have had a firearms certificate? It is submitted that there is no basis for that belief. Professor/

Professor Cooke offered the following view (Day 22, p. 2688) -- and I quote: "Dealing with the precise situation of Hamilton" -- and this is the question put to him -- "Dealing with the precise situation of Hamilton, we heard in evidence that a number of concerns arose in relation to him, both of cruelty and neglect of children, requiring boys to train in swimming trunks, taking photographs of them and taking videos of them, and showing weapons to them. There had been a number of parental complaints". The answer to which is "Yes".

The questioner goes on: "With that information would you have been able to make enquiries about Hamilton which would have enabled you to draw a conclusion as to his fitness to hold a firearms certificate?" The answer was: "I think it would be difficult. It is difficult to see the link between paedophilic interest and violence. In fact, paedophiles as a whole tend to be non-violent. The fact that he had these other interests would not necessarily be any indication of a propensity to be violent with firearms."

In/

3.40 p.m.

In his first report, Dr. Baird did not consider that Hamilton's sexuality provided any direct explanation for his heinous crimes. He said that the fact that he owned guns and was a paedophile were coincidence.

It was suggested in cross-examination that violence by Hamilton might be predicted should he be confronted by an angry parent who suspected that he was a paedophile. I have already addressed you, sir, on the way in which Hamilton was able to remain in control when confronted in similar situations.

Taken together, it is submitted that there is nothing in the evidence of the psychologists and psychiatrists to suggest that the police in any way failed to take factors known to them into account which, if they had, would have changed any of the decisions which were made in relation to the suitability of Hamilton to possess a firearm.

I would now like to turn, sir, to the question of Hamilton's membership of clubs. From 1987 there is clear evidence that Hamilton was a member of the Stirling Rifle & Pistol Club. That is Wood (Day 4, p.444) and Crawford (Day 4, p.392). In the early 1980s, he was a member at Callander Gun Club where he shot with Clive Wood. Wood, (Day 4, p.442; Moffat, Day 3, p.359). In 1982 he was also a member at Dunblane Rifle Club where he met Ewen Anderson. He attended there for some years. That is Anderson (Day 5, p.587). He taught the boys who attended the Dunblane Rover Group which Hamilton had formed in late 1981. G.F. Smith thought that the Stirling Club inherited Hamilton from the Dunblane Club when it folded (Day 4, p.429). Hamilton would still have required formal nomination and acceptance had this been his means of introduction to the Stirling Club (Day 4, p.432). We know, sir, that he was a member of the Clyde Valley Pistol Club in 1985 and 1986.

On balance, one can conclude that from the early 1980s Hamilton was probably a member of Dunblane Rifle Club until it closed in 1986/87. During this period he was also a member at the Callander/

Callander Gun Club and the Clyde Valley Pistol Club for at least some of the time. From the evidence, it is difficult to say what his membership was in the late seventies although it could have been with either Dunblane or Callander or both.

There has been evidence led, sir, on the frequency with which Hamilton shot. The ammunition sales suggest frequent shooting until 1986 and although there appears to be a break in recorded sales between 1979 and 1984, in 1987 sales drop. However, the evidence suggests that Hamilton continued to shoot. That is Crawford (Day 4, pp.392 and 417) and Wood (Day 4, pp. 444-446). Crawford saw him at shoots organised by the Stirling Club, albeit always with Clive Wood. Wood recalled a number of visits to Ashgill during the late eighties. Only in 1992/1993 did Wood consider Hamilton's shooting to have been insignificant. Crawford thought that from May, 1995 until June, (sic) 1996 he didn't shoot with the Stirling Club (p.397). Although the overwhelming evidence is to the effect that Hamilton did not manufacture his own ammunition, it would appear that he did purchase from the ranges he attended. Wood recalled him purchasing Early Target Ammunition manufactured by Mountain & Sowben. It was of a type which had been repacked. Wood (Day 4, pp.445-446). Such a purchase would not require to be recorded on Table 2 of Hamilton's firearms certificate provided it was all shot at the club where purchased. The only evidence contrary to that is from Mr. Cole (Day 17, p.2137). The overwhelming evidence points to there being no requirement for club purchases to be recorded unless some ammunition is not utilised and is subsequently to be removed from the range. Of course, home made ammunition does not require to be recorded under any circumstances. On balance, sir, it is submitted that Hamilton made use of his firearms certificate to a greater or lesser extent throughout the period from 1977 until his death.

The next section which I would wish to touch upon is in relation to his handling of guns. No witness spoke to Hamilton being unsafe with a firearm whilst on the range. The weight of evidence is in fact to the contrary. Mr. Ross Watt (Day 7, p.856) described Hamilton as being "very careful". Garry McDonald (Day 5, p.564) thought he was "very strict when it came to safety in shooting".

shooting". Anderson (Day 5, p.588) said "The discipline was excellent". Gordon Crawford (pp.401 and 416) considered his handling of firearms was safe. G.F. Smith (Day 4, p.428) thought he was careful with his firearms. W.P. Campbell (Day 4, pp.437 and 440) stated that everything he was asked to do he did properly. William Cole (Day 17, p.2136) had no reason to doubt Hamilton's safety with a gun. G.F. Smith, the present President of Stirling Rifle & Pistol Club (Day 4, p.428) could recall only one occasion when Hamilton had broken one of the club's safety rules. Hamilton had lowered a gun out of line with the target and had been corrected by one of the members, which criticism had been accepted by Hamilton. To put that incident in context, Mr. Smith said that everybody has at some time or another been picked up for something in relation to safety. On the same page, Mr. Smith recounted that at a meeting of various members of the club held after the 13th March, nobody could think of anything Hamilton had done or said which, even viewed with hindsight, should have resulted in some action having been taken by the club. That finding, sir, must be put in context of the evidence given by Crawford (Day 4, pp.394, 395 and 400), Smith (Day 4, p.427), Campbell (Day 4, p.439) and Wood (Day 4, p.488) to the effect that Hamilton shot rapidly. Crawford described him as shooting without a good understanding of competition shooting. It must also put in context the second factor, namely the evidence of Hamilton attaching stickers to the various targets at which he shot.

For what it may be worth, views on Hamilton's ability as a marksman were mixed. They ranged from "poor" as described by Crawford to "reasonably good shot" as described by Smith.

That is all I propose to say at this stage, sir, in relation to Hamilton as the evidence has described him.

I would now like to turn to the third section in the submissions which is that dealing with the law and practice relating to firearms. I will not set out the terms of Section 27(1). They are there for us to see.

It is clear that what firstly requires to/

to be done by a Chief Officer of Police is to be satisfied that the applicant has good reason to hold a firearm. The question then arises of what constitutes good reason. The Act, as we have seen, is silent and recent case law provides little or no assistance. The guidance issued by the Home Office and the Scottish Office, document 1L, provides at paragraph 6.8(e) "A certificate.....should not be granted.....unless the applicant has regular and legitimate opportunity of using the weapon. e.g. for target practice as a member of a pistol shooting club".

The joint submission made to you, sir, by the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Home Secretary, which hereafter I shall refer to as the joint submission, repeats the terms of the guidance and then goes on to state "This makes it clear to the police that membership of a target shooting club at which the applicant can use a particular pistol or revolver can be regarded as a good reason for the issue of a firearms certificate to possess it and the ammunition for it. We understand that all police forces in Great Britain adhere to this advice and will issue firearms certificates to members of clubs under the circumstances, provided that they are otherwise thought to be suitable" and that comes from page 11 and paragraph 55.

LORD CULLEN: Mr. Taylor, do you take the view that the first of the two sentences which you quoted from the Government evidence is dealing with the same proposition as the proposition quoted from the guidance?

MR. TAYLOR: Indeed, sir, yes.

LORD CULLEN: Well, it has of course turned the proposition around because the guidance is talking about what are the circumstances in which a certificate should not be granted.

MR. TAYLOR; I accept that entirely, sir.

LORD CULLEN: It might be suggested the guidance is dealing with a sine qua non without necessarily putting the criterion whereas if you look at the Government's evidence it is expressed positively as if it is enough. Do you see what I mean?/

mean?

MR. TAYLOR: Yes, sir.

LORD CULLEN: In other words, it may be, I don't know, that all the guidance is saying is that you must not grant a certificate unless something is the case. It doesn't follow that that is the only thing that requires to be satisfied.

MR. TAYLOR: I accept it is not necessarily the only thing which requires to be satisfied.

LORD CULLEN: But if you turn to the Government's evidence, it is talking about what the police should do. Perhaps giving an impression that is all that is necessary. That is the point I'm making to you.

MR. TAYLOR: The guidance is not exclusive. There may be other reasons which would entitle an applicant to satisfy the good reason test.

LORD CULLEN: Yes, it may be that the guidance as properly understood, and it is most unfortunate that we get into this argument as to what it means, is saying no more than that it is absolutely essential that the applicant should have the opportunity to shoot regularly and legitimately presumably at a club but that is not to say that good reason is satisfied if nothing more is the case. One has to get back to the question of what a good reason is.

MR. TAYLOR: In my submission, given the terms of the documents which are before us, which do not happily live together, the natural interpretation should be made of them is that good reason equates to opportunity.

LORD CULLEN: What about the intention?

MR. TAYLOR: The intention would be implied in the fact that the application is being made to exercise that opportunity.

LORD CULLEN: Well, does that mean that the intention is part of good reason? That seems to/

to be what you are saying.

MR. TAYLOR: No, I don't think I intend to say that, sir.

LORD CULLEN: What I am concerned about is a case where somebody has simply not exercised the opportunity, apparently demonstrating that he has not had the intention of exercising the opportunity and with that, looking at the past, there is reason to doubt whether he has good reason. We are talking about a renewal situation of course.

MR. TAYLOR: In my submission, sir, both the guidance and the joint submission are framed in such a way they are looking to the future, not to the past.

LORD CULLEN: No doubt but in a renewal situation surely what has happened during the previous period has to be relevant? If somebody says what he wants to do is to have the renewal of a certificate and past events have demonstrated that he has taken no steps to use the gun for which he is seeking to have a certificate, might it be said that there is a reason there to doubt whether he has good reason because past events demonstrate lack of intention? It might of course be when the police interview him they are completely convinced he genuinely does have that intention but what I'm suggesting is that it may be that past non-use may indicate lack of intention but I am more concerned at the moment with asking what good reason entails. Does it include intention or not?

MR. TAYLOR: In my submission, sir, it does not include intention.

LORD CULLEN: So you say it does not really matter whether a person has any intention to use a firearm? Provided he can point to an ability to use the weapon, that is enough?

MR. TAYLOR: Yes, sir. In my submission, sir, if actual use had been intended then one might have found the guidance expressed slightly differently from the way in which one does find it expressed. One may have found the guidance saying that unless the applicant makes or intends to make regular and legitimate use of the weapon. Perhaps/

Perhaps the joint submission might say "applicant did or does use" rather than the words which we do find which are just "can use". Therefore, in my submission, the words do point towards there being no need for intention.

It would not be surprising, sir, if in the guidance there was some other criteria which might be said established good reason but the guidance was silent on that point. If one considers that guidance ought normally to be a document which sets out a number of ways in which a particular goal can be achieved, one might expect to find set out a number of ways in which good reason could be satisfied.

That is not what we find when we look at the guidance. We see only one test, if I can put it that way, but no other test.

I/

4.00 p.m.

I think on the evidence the only suggestion which there has been as meeting the "good reason" test other than that in my submission to you is that of the veterinary surgeon, who might require that in connection with his job.

LORD CULLEN: You mentioned vets. What is the position about collectors? Beyond target shooters and beyond vets are there other situations? By "collector" I mean someone who does not intend to use any part of his collection but merely to have it and to admire it.

MR. TAYLOR: I have not applied my mind to that. I think in terms of shotgun licensing there are specific provisions covering that.

LORD CULLEN: We can leave that for the moment. Perhaps we might get some assistance later from others.

MR. TAYLOR: Sir, if I can put forward a further argument in favour of the interpretation that I seek to put on the Guidance being exactly the same, that the test for the renewal is the same as for the grant, we have heard several witnesses speak to that, and I think that is correct, by looking at the various documents. If one was to include in the "good reason" test any concept of use one would require past usage by the applicant of a firearm he did not have permission to possess. I am not talking about past usage. But if the test is the same for grant as it is for renewal it would be difficult for anybody to be able to establish that they had used in the past a weapon which they were only about to obtain permission to acquire.

Mr. Richardson in his evidence sought to distinguish between the two, because I suspect he realised the absurdity which might arise. But the Guidance itself at Paragraph 73 indicates that there should be no distinction between the checks made by the police on renewal as opposed in a new application.

LORD CULLEN: I am not sure whether I see the point here. If you have got someone who is applying for the very first time, in the first place, / place, they can presumably point to having achieved membership?

MR. TAYLOR: Yes.

LORD CULLEN: And I suppose they won't have membership without having practised with a firearm, and that in itself would indicate an intention to use one, and no doubt unless there was some contra indication, any expressions of intention to use a firearm would be taken at face value. So what is the problem? It is when you get round to renewal and someone has not been using the firearm in the past, in other words in the period expired, that might tend to indicate lack of genuine intention.

MR. TAYLOR: I can see how past non-usage might indicate lack of genuine intention. Where I suspect we part company in this dialogue is considering the relevance of the intention.

LORD CULLEN: Because you say it does not arise.

MR. TAYLOR: It does not arise.

Perhaps another way of looking at it, sir, which might derive some support for the position which I seek to urge upon you can be derived from the Guidance when one looks at 6.8(1) where "good reason" needs to be satisfactorily demonstrated for each individual firearm. Now, we know that the quality of the records kept by the Gun Clubs is not such as would record the calibre of weapons which are being used by the members at the various Club meetings.

Crawford (Day 4, p. 420) and Penn (Day 22, p. 2621) suggested that the normal reason records were kept of who shot at a Club was to provide a queuing system.

Other witnesses gave evidence to the same effect. Mr. Bennett (Day 21, p. 2547) made a plea for Clubs to keep records of how often a particular weapon was shot, the implication being that he, Mr. Bennett, did not consider such records were presently being kept. Only Mr. Moffat (Day 17 p. 2150) considered that Army ranges required individual/individual weapons to be entered in the same record sheet, a record of which particular calibre of weapon was shot.

If no record is kept of the calibre of weapons being shot, then it follows that no check can be made of the use which a possessor of a particular handgun has made of that weapon. If past use is going to be the determinant of future intention it is going to be very difficult for an Enquiry Officer to verify the "good reason" requirement for each individual firearm, because there is no way that an Inquiry Officer is going to be able to know whether each individual firearm has been shot over the previous period of the certificate.

LORD CULLEN: Did Mr. Richardson say that past use was a determinant or merely a factor?

MR. TAYLOR: I will be able to assist you on that tomorrow, sir; perhaps not just now.

Sir, if past use was to be considered of some relevance in determining some future intention, the simplest way for that to be achieved would be to add an additional table to the two tables which presently exist on the Firearms Certificate. This would have facilitated a firearms certificate holder having his firearms certificate duly endorsed on the days on which he shot and recording the calibre of weapons which he used.

Moving perhaps from looking at the actual terms of the Guidance in the joint submission and looking to the practice, it may be thought at first sight that what was said by Mr. Bennett (Day 3, pp. 2555-2557) points to a different interpretation from that which I am urging upon you, sir. Bennett described the various steps taken in his Force to check with Gun Clubs to ascertain, inter alia how often a member shoots. However, the check on usage would not appear to be utilised in connection with any "good reason" test.

On Page 2557 Mr. Bennett said that even if an applicant had not shot for eight years he, Bennett would still be obliged to renew the Firearms Certificate for a further period if the applicant maintained that he had an intention to shoot. He did/did not consider he could do other than grant the application unless he could persuade his staff to talk the applicant out of it.

According to the evidence at this Inquiry, the practice in Dumfries and Galloway Police Force on one view is that if the applicant is not an active shooter the certificate would not be renewed.

That was said by Mr. Cameron (Day 21, p. 2507). Mr. Cameron also said (p. 2508) his Force's practice was at the grant stage to check if the applicant was an active member of a Club, but at renewal the only check would be on membership. That is so in his opinion because the focus at renewal is on opportunity. This suggests that opportunity does not involve the concept of "use" in his Force.

(p. 2530) "At the time of renewal, however, I think it would be fair to say that provided there was some current membership, it would be not usual for any further-ranging enquiry". He did however say that the applicant would be asked during the Inquiry to confirm his continued usage, by which I take it to mean his intention to have future usage.

From the tenor of Mr. Penn's evidence (Day 22 p. 2618) it can readily be implied that checks are not made by the police at the Clubs of which he is a member to ascertain the extent of a member's frequency of shooting.

Mr. McCarthy, a member of the Bearsden Club, told the Inquiry (Day 21, p. 2574) that the only contact his Club had with the police was a call from an officer to confirm bona fide membership. The bulk of the Bearsden Club's members live in the Strathclyde Police area (Day 21, p. 2583). It would therefore appear that in Mr. Richardson's Force a check on usage is not undertaken.

On the other hand, Mr. Richardson (Day 19) said on several occasions that a check on use in order to determine "good reason" should be made at the Clubs of which an applicant for renewal was a member. Indeed, it was the different interpretation of what constituted "good reason" which formed the main basis for Mr. Richardson's criticism of CSP's procedures (Day 19, p. 2338). Mr. Richardson was not however saying that what he thought/thought should happen was followed in practice by his or indeed any other Force.

Mr. Bennett (Day 22 pp. 2545-2555) introduced the concept that there should be enquiry made at the Gun Club of which the applicant is a member with a view to determining how the applicant conducts himself when shooting. This is not a practice adopted by CSP. The only arrangement which we heard of was the reporting of a member to CSP should he be expelled from his Club. Any conduct short of expulsion would not be reported.

Sir,/

Sir, it is submitted that whilst this may be superficially attractive it is improbable that much will come of it. One might expect a certain reticence on the part of the club officials to comment on members' attitudes. They certainly are under no current obligation to respond, and given the terms in which the Stirling Rifle and Pistol Club have made a submission to you, sir, it is improbable that they consider there to be any obligation on them just now. On my reading of the submission they have made, their complaint is that the police did not tell them of the rumours which were circulating about Hamilton, but their submission stays silent on any suggestion that they might have drawn to the attention of the police any of the behaviour of Hamilton when shooting.

In my submission, there is no evidence before the Inquiry to suggest that other Forces make enquiry of clubs to ascertain whether the members there are competent shots and/or properly behaving on the range. One can say that in relation to Mr. Cameron's evidence in relation to the Dumfries & Galloway Police Force (Day 21, pp.2507 and 2508), Mr. McCarthy (Day 21, p.2583) and Mr. Penn (Day 22, p.2618). As commented already, the concept of "good reason" extends to each and every firearm which it is sought to possess. In that situation, what does "good reason" amount to? The Guidance provides no indication other than a requirement that an applicant has a regular and legitimate opportunity to use the particular weapon. It is thus submitted that if the club of which the applicant is a member owns or has access to a range or ranges which can accommodate all calibres of weapon, the "good reason" for a particular calibre has been established. The limiting factor will be the security arrangements for the weapons and the cost to the applicant in acquiring them.

If over the life of the Certificate an applicant did not acquire one of the weapons which he has authority to possess he would be entitled to renewal of that authority providing he maintained the appropriate membership and continued to wish to have the opportunity to acquire the weapon during the currency of the certificate about to be granted. This is the approach impliedly advocated in the booklet published by the British Field Sport Society (Day 9, p.1126), and it would in my submission appear/appear to be the approach also adopted by the Police Authority for the area in which Mr. Penn resides, and should that not be the Metropolitan Police, it would appear also to be the approach of the Metropolitan Police (Day 22, p.2635).

Mr. Cameron (Day 21, p.2505) confirmed that the interpretation which I have just sought to set out is that adopted in his Force. "If someone is involved in a range of shooting disciplines, as the law stands and as convention stands, if they can offer that as the reason for acquiring it, it would in all probability in most Forces I think be granted, because 'good reason' has been shown, and there is no concept in the Guidance of an upper limit, on the proviso that conditions are met in regard to security".

Mr. Bennett (Day 21, p.2556) commented adversely on the number of weapons which shooters are entitled to possess and in respect of which he felt he had no alternative but to allow.

The approach adopted by these two Forces is the one which on the evidence is adopted by Central Scotland Police. Lynch (Day 11, pp.1316 and 1317) said that he always went through the application form with every applicant to discuss any authority which they held to acquire a gun and which had not been acquired. Provided the Club still met the criteria for firing the weapon and the applicant still had an intention to purchase then he would recommend renewal of the authority.

We know that all the ranges used by the Stirling Club were able to accommodate all calibres (Day 17, p.2139).

The other question which cropped up from time to time in evidence was in relation to the possession by Hamilton and by others of more than one weapon of the same calibre. Again, it is submitted that the test must be "good reason". Bennett (Day 21, p.2560) gave examples of what constitutes good reason in such a situation as practised in Fife. He said that if someone wanted to shoot at 25 metres and 50 metres and he didn't want to zero his sights on each occasion he changed distance and he then wants a spare weapon in case he is shooting in a competition and one jams or breaks then/then that would constitute good reason to possess three weapons.

Mr. Hyde (Day 3, p.324) thought it not unusual to have two weapons of the same calibre. Mr. Hyde operates a mail order gun business, and thus will have an overview of the practice throughout the UK. Mr. Cameron (Day 21, p.2505) echoed the view expressed by Mr. Bennett.

The approach taken by CSP is consistent with the foregoing. When giving evidence on Day 10, Mr. McKenzie set out their approach (pp.1191-1193). It is thus submitted that the interpretation which was made of the legislation and Guidance in respect of acquiring more than one weapon of the same calibre is to place a slightly higher hurdle in the path of the shooter but one which is readily overcome. Again, security will become the limiting factor.

Perhaps one can understand the view that is taken, because if an individual is a suitable person to possess a firearm he can do as much damage with one weapon as with a number. The events of the 13th March illustrate the point. Only one weapon was used to wreak the havoc of that day, save only for the bullet which Hamilton reserved for himself.

LORD CULLEN: I see you have come to a natural break. We will rise now and resume at 10 tomorrow.

WEDNESDAY, 10th JULY, 1996.

TWENTY-SIXTH DAY.

LORD CULLEN: Let's resume. Mr. Taylor, you had reached some discussion about ammunition?

MR. TAYLOR: Before going on to ammunition there was one point which I undertook to come back to this morning and that is in relation to Mr. Richardson's evidence, and how he applied the concept of use, and I think the question which your lordship put to me was whether or not "use" in Mr. Richardson's world was a necessary prerequisite in determining the factor of "good reason". I have looked at the evidence and I think it is fair to say that Mr. Richardson considers past use to be an essential, and the passages which support that are Pages 2299 and 2327. He doesn't in fact say that in as many words and I think he.....

LORD CULLEN: That is what I thought was the passage.

MR. TAYLOR: That is what he says. Sir, yesterday we were talking about "good reason" and the requirement for intention. Having looked at the transcript this morning there is one point which I would seek to clarify with your lordship's leave. It is my submission that "good reason" and "intention" are two separate concepts. As I said yesterday, the concept of "intention" -- that is the intention of the applicant -- is something which is implied by virtue of the fact that he is making application to hold a Firearms Certificate and the membership of the Club which is going to enable him to make use of that certificate to exercise his intention to provide him with the opportunity. And the application form itself, sir, makes it clear that there has to be some intention because Question 23 from the application form is in the following terms: "Where do you intend to use each of the firearms listed?" That is the only point in the application where "intention" is mentioned, and that is why I say that it is implied by virtue of the fact that the applicant has completed the form.

Having/

Having completed the form, the test which then requires to be satisfied is whether the applicant has the opportunity to shoot. As I said a few moments ago, I distinguish between the intention to use and the opportunity to use. He has first of all the intention, and having stated that intention, he then requires to demonstrate the opportunity. That opportunity becomes in my submission the key. It becomes the key because that is what the Guidance tells us.

In my submission, his actual exercise of the intention, in other words his actual usage, is in itself an irrelevant factor. The concern is that if the weapons are to be used they are to be used at a recognised Club.

Of course, sir, that then takes us back to the Guidance and how one interprets the Guidance, and since this is a particularly important aspect in my submission I wonder if I could just try to summarise what I hope I conveyed yesterday. I accept entirely that there is an interpretation possible such as that you put to me yesterday but, in my submission, the best interpretation of a document might be thought to be the author of that document since he might best know what it was that the document was intended to convey. If that is accepted, and given that there is a potential for ambiguity in the Guidance, then we should in my submission have regard for what is said in the evidence of the Secretary of State and the Home Secretary, and this is what one finds in the joint statement, the Green Book as Mr. Campbell referred to it as being.

Support for that goes further because if the Guidance is setting out only the absolute minimum, which is the interpretation which you were putting forward yesterday as I understand it, then further criteria have to be met. It is surprising that if that is the correct interpretation one does not find any examples of these further criteria mentioned anywhere in the body of the Guidance notes. For example, if past use was to be thought a relevant criterion to add.....

LORD CULLEN: I don't think I ever suggested that it was a criterion. I think you are not perhaps meeting the point that I was suggesting to/

to you for consideration. I was suggesting the question was whether when you made application of this sort the concept of "good reason" might involve intention and past use might be a relevant place in which to look to see whether it was a genuine intention. It is not using past use as a test, it is merely looking at it as a source of information. Perhaps I could add I don't think that you are really suggesting that the Guidance is particularly clear on this point and nor am I. I think it is just it may be Guidance which does not in fact fully reflect what ought to have been said.

MR. TAYLOR: I cannot argue with that, sir. That may well be the case.

LORD CULLEN: It is not posing you with a difficulty. I don't think the terms of the Guidance are altogether clear and it may have been they could have been better expressed.

MR. TAYLOR: Well, I think you and I, sir, are at one on that. Just before I move on: it is my submission, however, that the concept of "intent" does not play part of the "good reason" and then.....

LORD CULLEN: I have your submission on that point.

MR. TAYLOR: In which case I won't labour the point any further and I can move on to look at another question which seemed to cause some difficulty and that is the question of ammunition.

The arguments, sir, in respect of ammunition and the "good reason" requirements are really just echoes of what one finds in the good reason to acquire a firearm. One goes with the other hand and glove. The opportunity to shoot at the Gun Club is the good reason to hold and acquire not only the firearm but the ammunition to go with it. The question, of course, which has been brought to the Inquiry is how much ammunition ought there to be in any one person's possession. The Guidance doesn't in fact say what that figure should be. In fact, it goes on to say that "No arbitrary limit should be placed on the amount of ammunition".

We then in Paragraph 6.8(j) of the Guidance/

Guidance get a clear indication that it is not possible to give firm guidance on the amount of ammunition which may be authorised by a certificate and you must deal with each case on its own merits.

One then has to look at what are the merits that require to be examined. The suggestion at the Inquiry has been that the amount of past purchases and the use of commercial ammunition should be an important consideration in assessing the amount an applicant should be authorised to purchase or possess. I have already touched on what use may be made of past usage, but I also question the relevance of the amount of ammunition which an applicant is authorised to acquire or hold in respect of use. Any Firearms Inquiry must look to the future period of certification and not to the past. An applicant's past use of ammunition may have no relation to his future needs. He may wish to increase his activity.

LORD CULLEN: Is need the test?

MR. TAYLOR: His further intentions.....

LORD CULLEN: Is need the test?

MR. TAYLOR: No, what I am saying the test is.....

LORD CULLEN: Then you say "Might have no relation to his future needs".

MR. TAYLOR: His future intention.

LORD CULLEN: I thought intention wasn't the test?

MR. TAYLOR: It is not, sir, the test when it comes to "good reason". We are here looking at the amount of ammunition which requires to be held. What one has first of all is good reason to hold the ammunition. The test for the good reason to hold the ammunition is the same test as the reason to acquire the firearm. These are the two which go together. One must then look to see what amount of ammunition the applicant should be entitled to hold. We are told in the Guidance that no arbitrary limits are to be set. We are not here/here talking of good reason for holding a particular amount of ammunition, we are in a different aspect of the Guidance at this stage in my submission, we are simply looking to see how much it is he should hold. That is separate altogether in my submission from "good reason".

It is also suggested in the criticism that the amount which can be purchased at any one time must have a direct relationship with the frequency of shooting. But that might not be immediately clear if a shooter uses a lot of ammunition on one shoot or visit to the Gun Club then no matter how rare an occurrence that might be it might well be reasonable for him to purchase a large amount at one time. We were told in the Guidance that consistency of performance and cost were relevant factors in deciding how much any particular shooter should be entitled to hold; we find that at 6.8(j). In my submission, there is no suggestion that a less enthusiastic Club member should not be entitled to these benefits.

It is submitted, sir, that the risk of giving too much ammunition is one of security. If an applicant is considered suitable to hold a firearm and ammunition and to have good reason to do so, it really should make no difference whether that authority is for 15 or 1500 rounds provided that he has adequate security.

In any event, sir, it has to be said that whilst there may have been some raised eyebrows in relation to the amount of ammunition in which Hamilton was authorised to acquire and possess, no one has been able to say how much is too much. Mr. Richardson certainly was invited to and declined to do so. He was able to refer to the previous Guidance which was in force until 1989 and which he considered placed a limit of 1500 rounds. I have set out, sir, what the previous Guidance stated and it is as follows, "It is impossible to give firm guidance on the amount of ammunition authorised by a certificate but Chief Officers of police have accepted that the following figures represent reasonable quantities for bona fide Club members (i) the maximum number of rounds to be possessed at any one time 1500; (ii) maximum number of rounds to be purchased at any one time, 1000. Each case should, however, be dealt with on its merits".

Sir,/

Sir, Hamilton was a bona fide Club member. It would appear therefore that the amount of ammunition which Hamilton was authorised to hold represented what was at least until 1989 a reasonable quantity for him to hold. I have to say in passing, sir, the Guidance which existed before is perhaps not significantly clearer than the Guidance now in that it talks of a reasonable quantity and a maximum at the one time.

I think we can now move on to look at other aspects which are encompassed within Section 27 and these are danger to the public safety or the peace, intemperate habits, unsound mind, any reason unfitted to be entrusted with a firearm. In the very helpful note which was provided by Counsel to the Inquiry the authors conclude on Page 22, after considering the cases, that the Court has not considered each test as being in a separate compartment. They consider that the Courts have applied the composite test. In my submission, sir, that is a sound analyses and it is one which I suspect was arrived at after a great deal of scrutiny of a number of cases.

The composite test may be expressed as being whether or not circumstances reveal the likelihood of a disturbance to good order arising out of the possession by the applicant of a firearm. I appreciate, sir, that that seems an echo only of the first of the four criteria which have been set out, in other words, the ones come into 27(1) of the Act, but a person who is of unsound mind and in the possession of a firearm is likely to be a risk to the disturbance of good order. The same applies in respect of a person of intemperate habits. A person will be unfitted to be entrusted with a firearm in circumstances where such possession is likely to be a risk to the disturbance of good order. It is, sir, the risk to good order which makes such a person unable to be entrusted.

This approach echoes the views which were set out by the Sheriff Substitute in the case of JOY v. THE CHIEF CONSTABLE OF DUMFRIES AND GALLOWAY which was reported in 1966 Sheriff Court reports at Page 93, and at Page 94 the Sheriff substitute said, "The proviso" -- and I think he was looking at the 1937 Act which is in exactly the same terms at least so far as this Act is concerned, the/the Act which we have to look at -- "The proviso lays down that an applicant should not have been given a Firearm Certificate if he is prohibited under the Act from possessing a firearm if he is of intemperate habits or of unsound mind or if for any other reason he was unfit to be entrusted with a firearm. This provision did seem to me to have relevance to the character of the applicant from the point of view of public safety". The main test which have been set out for "public safety" as used by the Sheriff Substitute is "good order".

Support for this approach, sir, is to be found in ACKERS v. TAYLOR (1974) 1 ALL ENGLAND REPORTS at Page 771 where Ashworth J. said at Page 775, "All of us know to our cost to what extent good order and the principles of good order are today subject to disturbance, and I would for my part be prepared to entrust a very wide discretion (to Chief Officers of police) so long as the discretion is exercised in connection with the use or possession of a gun".

Again, sir, there is a link between possession of the gun and the good order. Further support is derived from the judgment of Lord Justice Bingam, the now LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, in the case of SPENCER-STEWART v. THE CHIEF CONSTABLE OF KENT, 1989 CRIMINAL APPEAL REPORTS, Page 307: "If therefore an applicant or holder of a licence is given to the commission of offences which, however serious, do not involve the slightest risk or likelihood of use of a shotgun, then that, in my judgment.....is not a ground for refusing or revoking a licence".

LORD CULLEN: If the test is approached in the way you described why do we have the proviso at all?

MR. TAYLOR: I well understand why your lordship makes that point and it is difficult to see why one does have that proviso. But that said, it does seem to be the only way in which one can make any sense of the way in which the Courts have approached the interpretations to Section 27. One finds on occasions that one type of behaviour will fall within a number of different aspects of Section 27. One will find it, for example, that drinking and driving may be thought to be a prohibition because of intemperate habits, whereas on another occasion/occasion it will be thought to be a case which is otherwise unfit to be entrusted.

LORD CULLEN: Of course, one explanation could perhaps be that the proviso is intended to deal with radical defects in the applicant, and there may be occasions in which we don't have these radical defects but nonetheless from past performance, perhaps predictions as to future performance, there is a risk that good order and the public peace might be disturbed, without necessarily having to go quite so far.

MR./

10.20 a.m.

MR. TAYLOR: I accept that as a possible explanation, sir. It is one of perhaps several. It could be for example that another possible interpretation might be that the proviso is there for the avoidance of any doubt.

LORD CULLEN: Another way of expressing the same thing?

MR. TAYLOR: Yes.

LORD CULLEN: Anyway, it has been with us for rather a long time.

MR. TAYLOR: It certainly has, and has not improved with time, I might be tempted to say.

The very fact that at this Inquiry so much time has been spent on seeking to interpret what the Act might mean and even worse, seeking to interpret what the Guidance Note means, illustrates the very difficult task which any police officer has when he comes to operate this framework.

It does appear, sir, that the view which I have urged upon you is one which other police officers have adopted, and not just officers from the Central Scotland Police. Mr. Richardson in his report after acknowledging that there were a number of criteria to be met did say "Principally, these centre on whether the applicant has good reason to acquire a firearm and ammunition and can possess these without danger to public safety". So he too is taking a composite approach. Mr. McMurdo adopted a similar line, for example at Day 12, p. 1552.

If I could now touch on revocation and renewal. When deciding if he should revoke or refuse to renew a firearms certificate the Act requires the Chief Officer to apply different criteria. Good reason does not enter into the equation when revocation is in contemplation. Similarly, the requirement that the Chief Officer of Police must be satisfied the applicant can possess a firearm without danger to the public safety or to the peace does not feature in Section 30. This latter distinction is however of little practical significance/significance, given the way in which the Court has developed the test, as I have previously submitted.

When deciding if he should revoke or refuse to renew a firearms certificate, a Chief Officer of Police is called upon to exercise a discretion. He cannot abdicate that discretion and refuse to revoke on each occasion when a decision falls to be made, thus leaving it for the Sheriff to sort matters out on appeal. It is the Chief Officer who is charged with the responsibility of forming a view and thereafter implementing the decision reached.

His discretion has to be exercised within a statutory framework. He must act lawfully. One way in which he might test whether the exercise of a discretion is reasonable is for him to consider what view an Appellate Court might take of his decision. If the Chief Officer forms the opinion or forms the view that on no account would he succeed on appeal then he should realise that he is probably not exercising his discretion reasonably. He is not acting within the parameters set down in the Act, and the interpretation thereof.

Mr. McMurdo acknowledged this (Day 12, p. 1506) when he said that it was always a consideration for any police officer that he has got to justify his decision before a Sheriff. He is not there saying that he does to wish to waste time on an appeal or that he is frightened of being overturned on appeal. All he is saying is that it is a consideration, and in my submission a correct consideration.

Sir, I agree with what was said yesterday by Mr. Campbell, that the risk of adverse reaction on appeal should not influence a decision of a Chief Officer of Police. In my submission, Mr. McMurdo at no time said that that was a factor which influenced him.

When considering whether to revoke or to refuse a firearms certificate it is submitted that a Chief Officer cannot act on a whim: he cannot act on intuition; he cannot act on a "gut feel", which is the much-used phrase at the Inquiry. If he is to revoke or refuse an application he must be able to lead evidence in support of his contention that the/

the applicant or older is likely to cause a danger to the public by virtue of his possession of a firearm. To use the composite test with unsubstantiated material will not suffice.

Mr. Bennett expressed himself (Day 21, p. 2554) in the following way: the question put to him was "So even if your gut feeling was against the applicant, you would probably feel you had to grant?" and his answer was "Well, I have had a few gut feelings in five to seven years and I have had to grant them". On the same page Bennett said that if an allegation was made against an applicant by a credible and reliable source, which allegation was disputed by the applicant, he felt he would have to come down on renewing the certificate.

The foregoing, sir, is supportive of the position which was adopted by McMurdo. McMurdo comments (Day 12, p. 1533) that in all the stated cases he had ever read he hadn't seen one where there wasn't evidence. No action of which he knew had ever been taken in relation to firearms purely on a gut feeling.

This view is consistent with that expressed by other witnesses. Constable Ann Anderson (Day II, p. 1393) said: "I can't stop someone getting a firearm because I have a bad feeling about them". It may be thought that in such circumstances the police ought to refuse a renewal. If society so desires, then society will have to so legislate.

Sir, much comment was made at the Inquiry about the need for criminal convictions or otherwise. A criminal conviction is not necessary for revocation or refusal to renew; and although it was suggested yesterday by my learned friend Mr. Campbell that Mr. McMurdo seemed to be of that view, in my submission Mr. McMurdo made it very clear in his evidence that he did not consider a criminal conviction to be necessary for either revocation or a refusal to renew. What he did say was that he found the approach taken by the Fiscal in not proceeding with the cases to be supportive of his decision, and he might need to re-visit his decision were they to have previous convictions, because perhaps they were taking a different view of the seriousness of the facts than he had done: but he was/

was not in any way saying there was a prerequisite for revocation that there had to be a previous conviction.

However, sir, if any member of a police force did have such a view it would be understandable given the message sent by those who set "good practice". In the Joint Submission by the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Scotland it is said in the section dealing with revocation: "Unless a certificate holder sustains a criminal conviction during the currency of his certificate, the conditions for revocation may not often apply in practice" (para. 79, p. 15). That seems to be the view of the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Scotland. It is therefore perhaps not surprising or would not be surprising if some police officer has picked up that cue.

That, sir, is all I propose to say in relation to the law and practice of firearms, but I would now propose to move on to the firearms licensing procedures which were adopted by Central Scotland Police.

The Inquiry has examined the grant of renewals and variations of firearms certificates to Hamilton over a period of 19 years since the original grant in 1977. The procedures adopted by CSP in respect of firearms licensing during that period have changed. Changes have been implemented to meet amendments to the legislation and Guidance to Police and to meet the recommendations of HMCIC. These recommendations have sought to reduce the involvement of police officers in firearms licensing and to increase the role of civilians. The general direction throughout that period has been towards a civilianised system of firearms licensing.

The most significant changes which have occurred in CSP's procedures during this period occurred in around 1989, when following the 1988 Act the Standing Orders used by the Force were amended, as was the paperwork completed by them in firearms enquiries.

The other significant change has been the introduction of a civilian firearms examiner in 1991, and that examiner now fulfils the role of the Enquiry Officer in renewal applications arising in a particular/particular geographical area within the Central Scotland Police's jurisdiction.

Despite the changes, the licensing procedures adopted by CSP throughout the period of enquiry have comprised, broadly, two elements. The first involves an investigative or enquiring role by Divisional Officers, or the Firearms Examiner. The second is an administrative role carried out by the Firearms Department. Both of these elements come together to present a recommendation for grant or refusal by the Deputy Chief Constable.

CSP have resisted the pressure that has been brought to bear on them by the Government to move towards a postal renewal system. We have also insisted that all applicants be interviewed at the time of renewal. This is in spite of the Home Office advice that police should not generally visit a person who is applying to renew a certificate unless the material circumstances have changed.

At this stage, sir, the evidence given at the Inquiry as to the procedures adopted by CSP will be analysed. This exercise has already been undertaken by Mr. Richardson in his report.

At the outset, sir, the enquiry of the applicant is initiated by the receipt of an application to grant or, on renewal, a computer-generated reminder that the current certificate is due to expire. The reminder is passed to the Divisional Officer or the Firearms Examiner. In accordance with the Guidance to the Police (para. 6.2) a prior appointment is made with the applicant.

Now, sir, at the pre-arranged time the police constable or firearms examiner will visit the applicant. Mr. Lynch explained the steps which he would take on meeting the applicant (Day 9, p. 1298). He would take an application form with him to explain the information which the applicant requires to supply; he will then check the weapons and ammunition held; he will check the security for the weapons and the ammunition; he will discuss with the applicant his reasons for wanting the weapons for which he seeks authority to possess or acquire.

This/

This procedure is not particular to the civilian examiner. Ann Anderson (Day 11, pp. 1389- 1391) and John Brown (Day 10, p. 1274) described taking similar steps. Although there was a little confusion as to the whereabouts of the existing firearms certificates during the renewal, the weight of evidence suggests that the Enquiry Officer will have sight of the certificate. Norman Lynch (Day 10, p. 1303) and John Brown (Day 9, p. 1273) confirmed this.

In addition to the basic housekeeping checks of amount of ammunition held and the serial numbers of firearms described, the Enquiry Officer's investigation is intended to allow them to answer broadly three questions: (1) Are the security provisions adequate? (2) Is the applicant suitable to be granted a firearms certificate? and (3) Does he have good reason to hold the firearms and ammunition for which he seeks authority to acquire or possess?"

Now, I take each of these in turn. In so far as security is concerned, this is self-explanatory. It is however worthy of note that in Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary's letter of 25th November, 1995 (Chap. L, Vol. 7) to Mr. Wilson, the Chief Constable of CSP, the Inspector singles out this aspect of CSP's procedures for praise. Mr. Richardson found nothing to praise or at least if he did, he said nothing of it.

The suitability of the applicant. The enquiry into the applicant's suitability is intended to identify whether, using the shortened version of the test already referred to, there is any reason to believe that the applicant is likely to be a danger to the public by virtue of his possession of a firearm. The core of the enquiry in this respect has, throughout the period under review, been a check of the Police National Computer and Scottish Criminal Records Office records. Although it cannot be confirmed that these checks were made prior to the 1989 renewal, there is no evidence before the Inquiry to suggest that they were not. The Enquiry Officers involved pre-1989 were not asked to comment when in the witness box.

In 1992 and 1995 the Enquiry Officers recorded/recorded the outcome of PNC and SCRO checks on the new improved RL3a form, both stating that there was no trace. Ann Anderson (Day II, p. 1383) also checked Criminal Intelligence. A Force Memorandum issued in 1990 instructs that a Criminal Intelligence check should be made when considering a firearms renewal.

Now, it is difficult to envisage what other checks an officer might carry out to assess an applicant's suitability other than perhaps a check of DVLA, which would provide information of any drink driving offences. This is not to suggest that criminal activity is the only basis for rejecting an application as unsuitable: it is rather a realisation that police officers are unlikely to be in a position to identify any reason why an applicant is unsuitable to hold a firearm on anything other than the tangible evidence which will be recorded on these registers. The reason for this is that the Enquiry Officers will meet the applicant only briefly, perhaps for half an hour or so at the most.

As recommended in the Guidance, the applicant is forewarned of the visit. He is likely to take steps to ensure that his house is in good order and that he is on his best behaviour when the officer arrives.

His/

10.40 a.m.

His firearms are likely to be secure and any evidence of a lifestyle or behaviour which might give rise to questions of his suitability, principally the abuse of alcohol, are unlikely to be on view.

The meeting can, by necessity, give only a fleeting impression of the individual and, it is submitted, is unlikely to provide the inquiry officer with any information on which to base an assessment of the applicant's character which would be able to subsequently withstand the scrutiny of detail, were that required.

Professor Cooke was asked how long it would take a psychologist to make an assessment of an individual's suitability to hold a firearm. He indicated that it was likely to take several meetings and a great deal of collateral information (p.2710). If it takes a trained psychologist this long to assess suitability, it would be unreasonable to expect a police officer to identify some covert reason to believe an applicant to be unsuitable on the basis of a meeting lasting less than 30 minutes. On the basis of Professor Cooke's evidence, extending the interview is unlikely to produce any different outcome. Sir, I think the evidence which I am referring to was given by Professor Cooke when answering questions put to him by, my memory tells me, Mr. Gibb and that it seemed to be a summation of the position which he has expounded when answering questions put to him by the learned Advocate Depute and Mr. Campbell.

Where there is no tangible evidence to give rise to a reason to believe the applicant is unsuitable, the police must rely on the counter signatory. He or she must have known the applicant for at least two years. On signing the application he confirms that he knows of no reason why the applicant is not a fit and proper person to hold a firearm. It is reasonable for the Force to rely on this declaration as an assessment of the character of an individual.

The inquiry officers check that the counter signatory has signed the application and Mr. Campbell, the counter signatory on this occasion, confirmed/confirmed he was contacted in both 1992 and 1995.

It might be suggested that given the extent of the reliance which is placed on counter signatories that it would be appropriate to interview them to ascertain their knowledge of the applicant. However, sir, it must be borne in mind that these inquiries have been made in a climate in which the view expressed by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary is that the use of a counter signatory should be discontinued. Mr. Cameron (Day 21, p.2488) confirmed that his perception was that there was no encouragement to check on counter signatories except in exceptional circumstances. Furthermore, in the joint submission, the politicians with responsibility for Britain's police forces, consider that checking on a counter signatory, and I quote, "Might involve a large number of fruitless police inquiries, since many counter signatories will be found to be people of impeccable character and will have no qualms about having vouched for the application". They conclude that to require the police to check on all counter signatories "could well detract from the overall efficiency of police checks without necessarily making them more effective".

Sir, against that background, it might be thought surprising that there is even a check made by Central Scotland Police on whether or not the counter signatory has in fact signed the form. They are doing that which they are urged not to do.

Finally, encouragement for the view that police inquiries into an applicant's suitability should focus on criminal behaviour by the applicant is obtained from the thematic inspection report and indeed from the joint submission. Paragraphs 4.8 and 4.9 of the thematic inspection report detail the background checks which the Inspectorate recommends should be carried out on applicants "in order to establish their character". They recommend that checks of PNC and SCRO should be carried out. They recommend that DVLA should be checked and of course Criminal Intelligence. Criminal Intelligence is referred to as particularly useful as a source of information on associates. The Inspectorate makes reference to no other background checks and makes no further recommendations or suggestions in respect of what the police might do to establish character.

HMCIC/

HMCIC also recommend that home visits are unnecessary at renewal. Postal renewals are recommended. HMCIC see no benefit to be gained by the police in assessing an applicant when making a visit. Without a visit, sir, the only character checks available are those on the computer.

At paragraph 62 on page 12 of the joint submission, reference is made to the Home Office Guidance to Police, which at paragraph 6.8 states "The main consideration is the applicant's character". The submission continues to comment that this requires a consideration of the applicant's criminal record. No other comment is made on character. The clear inference from this is that character should be viewed primarily in the context of criminal conduct. This theme is continued at paragraphs 65, 66 and 67 of the joint submission where discussion under the heading of "Personal Suitability" is focussed on a consideration of criminal record and criminal associates with a reference to mental health being the only aspect with no criminal flavour.

It is submitted that the only checks which could have been carried out by the various inquiry officers in the process of completing the various RL3As throughout Hamilton's firearms application history, and were not, were those of Criminal Intelligence and of DVLA. Criminal Intelligence was not checked in 1992. It was checked in 1989 and 1995 and there is no evidence one way or the other as to what happened before then.

Good reason. The inquiry officer is also required to ascertain whether or not the applicant has good reason to hold the firearms and ammunition which he seeks authority for. I won't repeat what I have already said in this regard.

All of the inquiry officers who gave evidence to the Inquiry spoke of the steps which they would take in this respect. None of the officers simply accepted the applicant's or Hamilton's declaration that he was a member of a club. Anne Keenan, Lesley Johnston and John Brown who dealt with the 1977, 1986 and 1989 renewals, could not recall the particular inquiries but said that it was their practice to check club membership where an applicant's reason for seeking authority to hold/hold and acquire the firearm was for target or competition shooting. They stated that it was their practice to do so by contacting the club to confirm membership. The inquiry officers who dealt with the 1992 and 1995 renewals were able to recall their inquiry. Norman Lynch stated that it was his practice to contact the club secretary of Stirling Rifle and Pistol Club to verify membership every time an applicant sought authority to possess or acquire a handgun. In 1995, Constable Anderson did not contact the club to confirm that Hamilton was a member. However, she states that she had sight of Hamilton's membership card for the club and was satisfied from that that Hamilton was a member. She was also part of an overall system whereby the Firearms Department of Central Scotland Police held a record of the membership of the Stirling Rifle and Pistol Club. On a member failing to pay his subscription, the club informed the Firearms Department. That was Crawford (Day 4, pp.409-410). At p.412 Crawford also said that there is a club rule that if anybody is expelled the police are informed. There was contrary evidence on this by Mr. Cole (Day 17, p.2134). I would, however, respectfully submit, sir, that Crawford's evidence should be preferred to Mr. Cole's. Your lordship may recall that Mr. Cole was also the witness who indicated that purchases of ammunition at the club, even if consumed in the club, would require to be recorded on the member's firearm certificate. So in two respects Mr. Cole seems to be at odds with what might otherwise be thought to be the weight of evidence.

We do know, however, from Mr. Cole that Stirling Rifle and Pistol Club had access to ranges suitable for the use of the firearms which Hamilton had authority to possess and acquire.

The amount of ammunition which Hamilton was authorised to purchase at any one time and the amount he was entitled to hold has already been touched upon. In 1987 he sought, by variation, to possess 1500 rounds and to acquire 1000. Constable Goldie dealt with the inquiry and he has no recollection of this part of the inquiry and the only explanation, and this is with hindsight, he could give for the increase is that the amount of ammunition purchased by Hamilton in previous years was substantial and disclosed that he was doing "a lot/lot of shooting". There are other speculations which we might have. It may be, for example, Hamilton shot several hundred rounds at a time. Mr. Bell (Day 4, pp.445 and 460). It may have been in 1989 the previous guidance was still very much to the fore in the minds of officers and the figures which were contained in this guidance used as a reasonable figure. That however, sir, is pure speculation. All of the inquiries involved from 1987 onwards comment on the detailed security arrangements.

Once the inquiry has been concluded, the RL3A is completed and then passed up the chain of command. The constable's immediate line manager is the sergeant. It is the sergeant's task to review the RL3A and ask such questions of the constable as he considers necessary to satisfy himself that the constable has completed the inquiry satisfactorily. Inspector Binning, the sergeant responsible for the supervision in 1986, details this relationship. On Day 10 at p.1262 he detailed the checks which he would make of a constable and the circumstances in which he would consider it necessary to do so. The level of scrutiny which is applied depends on the confidence and trust which the sergeant has in the constable. That trust will be developed over a number of years as the sergeant becomes familiar with the constable in question. The sergeant and other superior officers are also available for consultation should the constable experience a problem in the course of the inquiry. Anne Keenan (Day 10, p.1251) speaks to the fact that she would refer any problems to the supervising officer for advice. Mr. Allan (Day 9, p.1136) also states that he would expect the constable to liaise with his or her immediate superior if a problem arose. The interrogation by the sergeant ought to reveal any facets which perhaps the constable, through lack of experience, does not appreciate are problems. Mr. McMurdo (Day 13, pp.1586-1587).

As the RL3A passes up the chain of command, the inspector and chief inspector, as the system was for the 1995 renewal, checks that the form has been completed accurately and will also input any information or intelligence which they have on the applicant from their respective positions. Alan Cassidy, for example, the inspector involved with the 1977 application explained/explained that in discharging his role as inspector he would input any information which he had on the applicant (Day 9, p.1162). Hugh Paterson (Day 10, p.1268) the chief inspector involved in 1989 also confirmed that he would input his knowledge of the applicant as the RL3A passed through him to the senior officer. Further, should any additional information be considered necessary to allow a recommendation to be made by the Divisional Officer, this should be identified in the course of the passage of the form through the chain of command. For example, in 1986, where the application included a request for authority to acquire a duplicate .9mm calibre firearm, the constable made no comment other than to confirm that she was satisfied that the applicant had good reason. A superior officer subsequently noted the request and returned the RL3A to the sergeant to ascertain the applicant's reason for the request for duplicate calibre.

The form then reaches the Divisional Officer. It is the Divisional Commander's responsibility to make a recommendation to the Chief Inspector of Firearms to grant or renew. Robert Allan, the chief superintendent who recommended grant in 1977 explained the process which he would complete before recommending grant (Day 9, p.1136). He said that he would trust the inquiry officer working with the support of a sergeant to carry out proper inquiry. He would expect his attention to be drawn to the inquiry only if there was something amiss. Superintendent Matchett (Day 10, p.1271) also confirmed this to be the role of the Divisional Officer, as did Chief Superintendent Moffat who explained that, as Divisional Commander, he would review the RL3A to satisfy himself that all checks had been carried out and that the details noted in the form were correct and, unless he had information to the contrary, would recommend grant. The Divisional Commander will not look behind the officer's answers to the RL3A and will accept that the necessary inquiries have been completed.

It is therefore quite clear, sir, that considerable reliance is placed upon the constable in completing the inquiry and the sergeant in properly supervising the constable. In our submission, the delegation of inquiry to a constable is a reasonable and necessary procedure for Central Scotland Police and other Forces to adopt. Whilst it/it proceeds upon trust in the police constable, that is no different from the majority of police work where the investigating officer is a police constable working with the support of a police sergeant. In all police work, including firearms inquiries, senior officers must be entitled to rely upon a constable working in the system. The constable is supported by an immediate superior and by a chain of command available for consultation and assistance should the need arise. The sergeant, who is in immediate contact with the constable, is best placed to gauge his or her capabilities and to supervise the inquiry carried out by him or her. For that role to be repeated elsewhere in the chain of command would be inefficient and would mark the firearms inquiry out from other inquiries carried out by the police. It is submitted that there is no justification for the firearms inquiry to be distinguished in this way. The investigation required is well within the capabilities of the constable and the sergeant. Mr. McMurdo speaks to the foregoing on Day 13, pp.1586-1588 and indeed elsewhere in his evidence.

The procedure is different when the inquiry is conducted by the firearms examiner. The RL3A completed by him does not then follow the same chain of command. It does not pass through divisional officers. The current position is slightly different from that in place in 1992. However, in 1992, Norman Lynch reported directly to the Chief Inspector for Firearms who was at that time Ian MacKenzie. Mr. MacKenzie (Day 10, p.1225) explained the good working relationship which he developed with the firearms examiner. The chief inspector was available for consultation on a daily basis and a one-to-one relationship was developed. He described a composite role in which he performed a similar function to the sergeant, supporting and assisting the examiner and the sub-divisional officer, checking proper completion of the form.

The current position, sir, and I am not sure if there is actually evidence in the inquiry on this, is that the firearms examiner on completing his inquiry into the renewal will pass the RL3A and the application form to the Firearms Department for administrative checks and a review of the firearms file to be carried out. On this being completed, the certificate will be passed to the Depute Chief Constable/

Constable for signature. Only if there is a perceived problem will the file accompany the documentation. No other police officer will routinely be involved. This system has been introduced as part of the civilianisation drive and did not operate for any of the renewals and the forms which have been scrutinised in this Inquiry.

In 1992 and 1995 the paperwork then passed to the Firearms Department. Once there, the role of the Department is the same whether or not it has been completed by Divisional Officers or the firearms examiner.

Maureen Johnston (Day 11, pp.1407 and others) explained the operation of the Department. The applicant's file is maintained by the Department. The file should contain the previous certificates and applications. It should also contain any other information relevant to the applicant. That is Mr. Mather (Day 9, p.1080).

As Mr. Mather explained, in terms of the Force Standing Orders any information gathered by police officers relevant to the holding of a firearm should be communicated to the Firearms Department. Ian MacKenzie (Day 10, p.1198) confirmed that he would expect any information which suggested that the applicant might be a danger with a gun to be on the firearms file.

Maureen Johnston explained the role which she played, that when the RL3A is received by her she checks the file to ensure that the historical paperwork tallies with the application form and the details recorded on the RL3A (pp.1407-1408).

Mr./

11.00 a.m.

Mr. Mather explained that if on review the file disclosed that material had been placed there during the currency of the certificate being renewed, then that would be brought to his attention (Day 9, 1080). Similarly, if any trace has been found on PNC, SCRO, or any relevant trace on Criminal Intelligence, it will be attached to the RL3a and, together with the file, drawn to his attention.

Until May 1995, and at all times during consideration of Hamilton's various applications, the firearms file and the RL3a were passed together to the Chief Inspector of the Firearms Department.

Mr. Mather and Mr. McKenzie both spoke to that role (Day 9, 107), and Day 10 1225 respectively).

If there were no problems the certificate would be passed to the DCC. He would not receive the file. Only if a problem had arisen would the file be passed to him.

It therefore is in the hands of the Chief Inspector of Firearms that information input from both the enquiry officers and administration comes together, and a final recommendation by the Chief Inspector is then made to the Deputy Chief Constable.

With respect to Mr. Richardson, on a proper analysis of the evidence there is no question of the file not being referred to as a means of assessing the applicant. This appears to be the function which Mr. Richardson says falls between two stools. In my respectful submission this does not appear to be supported by the evidence. Both the Firearms Department and the Enquiry Officers had their respective roles to play in the assessment function, and the Chief Inspector of Firearms received their respective inputs. On Day 19 (2301) Mr. Richardson declined to say that good practice required the Enquiry Officers to have the file, or indeed for anybody in the divisional chain of command to have it. He said -- and I quote -- "The whole system must be sound. The Enquiry Officers make good enquiry under guidance and that the Firearms/

Firearms Department are proactive in checking the firearms files so that they can play their part in providing good information as the certificate progresses up the tree".

With that statement we respectfully agree. It is submitted that the system operated by Central Scotland Police meets the standard there specified.

The Central Scotland Police procedure permits the Chief Inspector -- that is the Chief Inspector of Firearms -- to consider any available information bearing on the applicant's suitability to hold a firearm, the historical documentation, and the Enquiry Officer's Report, following due support having been given by other officers, and in particular the Sergeant.

In saying this, it is accepted that in the case of Hamilton's renewals in 1992 and 1995 this procedure failed. Information relevant to Hamilton's suitability, namely the Hughes' memo and the information relevant to the Linlithgow incident, were not on the file, and therefore not brought to their attention. This was an error, but as I will submit later, Sir, nothing flowed from that error, because Mr. McMurdo was already fully conversant with both these aspects.

However, it is necessary to add that the omission of this information from the file would not have affected the decision in 1992 and 1995.

Ian McKenzie (Day 10, 1199 and 1200) stated that although he would have expected the memos relative to these incidents to be brought to his attention, they would not have affected his decision. And Mr. Mather gave similar evidence (Day 9, 1121 and 1122).

A recurring criticism of the enquiries has been their alleged failure in 1989, 1992 and 1995 to identify Hamilton's non-purchase of commercial ammunition between 1987 and 1995. This, it is said, would cast doubt on the usage, and hence on good reason -- and I don't wish to trample over that ground again.

Mr. Richardson accepted that if non-usage/usage was not a relevant consideration, then many of his criticisms would no longer be valid (Day 19, 2338).

Not only did he criticise CSP for not initiating a procedure to allow non-usage to be identified, but he evidenced many of his criticisms by the fact that non-usage had not been identified. For example, he rejected the Firearms Department claim that they do review the file on the grounds that, had they done so, they would have identified non-usage (Day 19, 2339).

If non-usage was not something which they were instructed to look for, then the reason which he gave for concluding that the Firearms File had not been considered would disappear.

One is then left with the evidence of the Central Scotland Police Officers that it is looked at. However, that was only one aspect of Mr. Richardson's criticisms. He continued in regard to the overall procedure. If we have understood his criticisms correctly, they can be summarised as a failure of the system to support the Enquiry Officer by way of adequate Guidance and direction.

In making this criticism Mr. Richardson assumes that the limit of the guidance given to an enquiry officer is the Standing Orders and the RL3a. He ignores the structure in which the officer operates and in particular the relationship between officer and sergeant -- that is police constable and sergeant.

As Mr. Richardson said in his evidence, one cannot look at one part of the system in isolation. One must look at the whole (Day 19, 2293).

Mr. Richardson has either failed to do that when considering Central Scotland Police's procedures, or it is submitted he has not analysed the evidence correctly -- or perhaps it is both.

There is considerable support for the view that the analysis of the evidence as contained in his report is unfair. I don't intend to go through it line by line, Sir, pointing out the inaccuracies/inaccuracies. If I can perhaps just be allowed to refer to one? On Page 35 it is recorded that in connection with the 1992 renewal Hamilton "Was never asked to demonstrate that he was a member of a Gun Club". The statement of Mr. Lynch, who dealt with the 1992 renewal, with which Mr. Richardson was supplied, stated: "I can confirm that I would have contacted the Secretary of Stirling Rifle & Pistol Club, Mr. Gordon Crawford, to ascertain from him if Mr. Hamilton was a member of the aforesaid Club".

When Mr. Lynch gave evidence (Day 11, 1322), he confirmed what he had said in his statement. It is thus submitted that the report at Page 35 does not fairly represent the content of either the statement or the transcript.

The RL3a is not intended to direct the officers, as stated by Mr. Richardson, but only to record the outcome of their enquiries. Mr. Richardson accepts that the investigation of a firearms application or renewal is well within the capabilities of a constable, provided suitable guidance and support was available to them.

That the officers did receive support and guidance from sources other than the RL3a and Standing Orders is clear from the evidence of those constables involved in renewals who have given evidence at this Inquiry. Despite Mr. Richardson's criticisms that the pre-1989 RL3a and Standing Order did not instruct or direct a check of Club membership, the evidence of officers Keenan, Bell and Brown, which we have already rehearsed, entitles a conclusion to be drawn that it was their practice to contact the Club to verify membership.

Further, although no PNC or SCRO check was specified on the form before 1990, Constable John Brown (Day 10, 1275) did make a check and recorded on the form that there was no trace of SCRO -- or on SCRO.

The other officers were never asked whether they checked PNC, SCRO or Criminal Intelligence, and therefore no conclusion can be drawn.

To say that a police constable requires guidance before he will know to check PNC and SCRO, as/as Mr. Richardson did, (2290) is perhaps a little surprising. If officers have the training and experience which (2296) he said they had, it would be surprising if they did not know to make such a check.

However, it is important to put Mr. Richardson's criticisms of the form in the correct time frame. The particular criticism regarding PNC and SCRO checks is historical. The 1990 form improved on the 1977 form, and did provide a reference to PNC or SCRO. Notwithstanding his criticism of the form RL3a for its lack of "support", Richardson does anticipate that an officer's training will have enabled him to perform, and know to perform, tasks such as checking at Gun Clubs.

He says -- and I quote -- "The police officer has training and experience to allow them to expand enquiries if they feel it is necessary" (day 19, 2296).

Mr. Cameron shared that view. When Mr. Bonomy put the RL3a to him and invited him to criticise it, he declined to do so. Under reference to the post-1990 form the following exchange took place: "Question: One would be worried, would one not, as to how the Enquiry Officer would find out whether or not he was a suitable person to hold a Firearms Certificate?" The answer given was: "I would hope a professional police officer at operational level would know there are certain issues of unsound mind and intemperate habits would prohibit someone from acquiring a weapon. I would hope they would have an awareness as to what that question meant".

Mr. Richardson's main criticism of the form post-1990 appears to be that it does not encourage the Enquiry Officer to detail the name of the Club of which the applicant claims to be a member, nor does it encourage him to attach documentary evidence. Again, despite this criticism, the Enquiry Officers post-1990 did specify the Club on the RL3a, and did confirm membership.

Apparently, within the system in which they operated the Enquiry Officers found the guidance/guidance and support which Mr. Richardson considers they needed to complete the enquiries in spite of the perceived or alleged shortcomings of the RL3a and Force Orders.

It is submitted that Mr. Richardson's criticisms are of form rather than of substance. We accept that a review of forms, particularly pre-1990, does not now allow an appraisal of the questions asked and answers received.

However, the forms were never intended to record an interview. It was intended that they record the outcome of the enquiries, and thus allow a contemporaneous decision to be made.

It would be unfair to judge a form on its ability to report information up to 19 years after it was utilised.

However, it has to be said that a system which cannot be improved does not exist, and Central Scotland's own procedures demonstrate how a process of evolution has led to improvements to the form and procedures as problems have arisen and been resolved.

Mr. Richardson's comments will be considered and adopted where it is thought that they are appropriate.

Mr. Richardson accepted that the Strathclyde form did not meet the standards he judged SCP against, and acknowledged that improvements could be incorporated in another revised form. It is submitted that his comments in relation to the RL3a should be viewed in the context of the form being perfectly adequate for use within the system operated by Central Scotland Police but, like the Strathclyde equivalent, capable of improvement. Support for this approach is obtained when one remembers that Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary only praised the form.

Mr. Richardson in his evidence (Day 19, 2314 to 2316) made clear that the procedures which he was judging Central Scotland Police against were not procedures adopted by Strathclyde, nor indeed any other police force. They were procedures which he had derived from first principles in the two-week period/period which he had been allowed to carry out his investigation and report.

Mr. Richardson states at Page 14 of his report, and in evidence (Day 19, 2300) that it was not the norm for either Enquiry Officers or Firearms Department to review the applicant's file to assess suitability or good reason at the time of renewal. He seems to conclude from this that the function of assessing "suitability" and "good reason" falls between the two, with each assuming that the other completes the task.

While we accept that the file was not reviewed by Divisional Officers when carrying out their enquiries, it is not fair, nor indeed is it logical, to conclude from that that they did not address the question of good reason or suitability, or that they assumed that it would be done elsewhere.

The evidence before the Inquiry quite clearly shows that Divisional Officers were aware of their responsibilities when undertaking the enquiry and did make an assessment of suitability and good reason.

This criticism again seems to be born of Mr. Richardson's assumption that scrutiny of past usage of the firearm and ammunition is essential before a renewal application can be granted.

Sir, while no doubt the system which he advocated was a perfectly sound system, it would be unfortunate if this Inquiry was to consider that there was only one way in which the obligations incumbent upon a Police Force in terms of the firearms legislation could be implemented.

Allowance must be made for the differing sizes of Forces and their particular cultures. An attempt was made to cross-examine Mr. Richardson on the issue of culture, but he didn't seem familiar with the concept. It is respectfully submitted that it is essential that police forces be entitled to develop their own procedures.

Further, Mr. Richardson was very keen on the concept of check lists. Whilst no doubt check lists have their place, they also have their limitations./

limitations. In another context you will have come across the situation whereby too readily the completion of a check list can become an end in itself, and too readily can the user of a check list "switch off" and fail to bring the appropriate level of thought to the process under consideration.

It has already been submitted that Mr. Richardson's analysis of the evidence is open to criticism. It would be unfortunate, however, if this was to be seen as a criticism of him.

By his own admission, he had only a two-week period in which to carry out the Inquiry, prepare his report and submit it. He had no opportunity to meet or interview those involved in the operation of the system. He had no opportunity to test if what he was saying were faults were truly faults and omissions. He had not read the transcripts, save for a consideration of Mr. McMurdo's the day before he gave evidence. He had relied on others to read the transcripts of his behalf.

In such circumstances it is not surprising that the analysis which he put forward of the system as explained by the witnesses takes a different form from the analysis provided in this submission.

Perhaps a better assessment of the system operated by Central Scotland Police can be found in the terms of the Thematic Inspection, and in particular the letter of the 25th November 1995 addressed to the Chief Constable from her Majesty's Chief Inspector. We can assume that that investigation was carried out without pressure of time. The procedures being inspected were quite clearly the procedures which were in place at the time of the 1995 renewal. Mr. Richardson accepted that the remit which he had was the same as part of the remit which those carrying out the Thematic Inspection were given (Day 19, 2323 and 2324).

It is perhaps therefore surprising that the criticisms found in Mr. Richardson's report are not echoed in that of the Chief Inspector of Constabulary.

One possible explanation is that the procedures/procedures adopted by CSP in relation to Hamilton's various applications for renewals and variations are different to the norm. To an extent that is true, but the evidence suggests only in so far as the correct paperwork was not contained in the Firearms File.

What/

11.20 a.m.

What is clearly the case is that the form RL3a was identical in the course of both inspections. Mr. Richardson criticises it. HMCIC praise it -- at least in so far as it provides a facility for recording security arrangements. If they considered it deficient in other respects they would have said so: they did not. Therefore judged against the standard of the body which sets "good practice" the form passes muster.

In short, sir, it is submitted that the fuller and more thorough report was the report carried out by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary. It offered no criticism of the procedures and I invite you, sir, to so find.

I would like to move on to the various decisions which were made in respect of grant or renewal and the variations of Mr. Hamilton's firearms certificate. In terms of Mr. Hamilton's conduct, the first suggestion which can be made that his possession of a gun was likely to give rise to a danger to the public follows the 1988 camp at Inchmoan Island, Loch Lomond. There are two aspects of the evidence dealing with the pre-1988 situation and these are to be found in Criminal Intelligence under reference D2/L(iii) and D3/L(iii). In my submission, they are irrelevant. The first has its principal purpose to draw to the attention of police officers that Hamilton was a suspected homosexual. The second records that the contributor's estranged wife had not received a refund of a prepayment for the attendance of their child at a summer camp in circumstances which did not, ex facie the form, give rise to a refund at common law. Perhaps it is not surprising that Mr. McMurdo considered the content of the intelligence ingathered on Hamilton before computerisation to be something of which he was not proud. He felt it should not have been there at all (Day 12 - I489). That it did not find its way on to the computerised system represents the exercise of good sense by some individual unknown to this Inquiry.

Inchmoan Island Camp 1988 is the first of the incidents and I will try not to look at the facts in too much detail because they have been gone over at some length at the Inquiry but, in my submission/submission, it is essential that we move away from a consideration of labels and we look underneath the labels to see precisely what it was that happened in the very events which it is said should have given rise to a revocation of Mr. Hamilton's certificate.

The camp at 1988 was said by Hamilton to be his fifty-fifth. No evidence has been led to contradict that, and the evidence from Mr. Williams two days ago provided some support for the view at least that there were a considerable number of camps. The main complaint arising from the holding of the camp was the conditions in the camp. Some boys claimed they were slapped by Hamilton who did not deny this but Hamilton thought it was necessary for discipline given that some boys were bullies, disruptive and cheeky. The boys were required to wear black swimming trunks in all weathers and this they continued to do even when Mrs. Haggart and Mrs. Reilly were in attendance. Significantly, sir, four of the boys refused to leave the camp and no parent was prepared to make a complaint against Hamilton. Indeed, some praised him.

When the papers went to Mr. Cardle, the Procurator-Fiscal at Dumbarton, he noted that there were certain discrepancies between the statements of the boys. They were precognosed, the discrepancies became greater, and the papers were marked "No proceedings". This was then made known to the police.

Meanwhile, Hamilton had complained of the manner in which the enquiry had been carried out by the two officers from the CSP who had investigated the matter. We then had the informal inspection by Inspector Michael Mill who met with McMurdo, prepared his report, and was aware that Hamilton had a firearms certificate. He did not have any grounds for concern that Hamilton should continue to be the holder of that firearms certificate (Day 8 - 965). McMurdo was away of Mill's view and expressed no concern. In fact, what he said was "The whole consideration was whether he was a suitable youth leader". This is McMurdo at Day 13, I557.

As we have heard, the informal report by Mill did not satisfy Hamilton and a formal investigation was then carried out by Inspector Keenan/

Keenan. Keenan spoke to a number of people who had not been spoken to by the original investigation, and some of the people to whom he spoke spoke highly of Hamilton's organisation, the food and equipment in the camp and his capabilities as a leader (Day 6 - 773 and 774). Inspector Keenan knew that Hamilton was a firearms certificate holder. He had experience of working in the Firearms Department. Had he come across a piece of information which may raise a question as to the suitability of Hamilton to hold a certificate he would have considered it his responsibility to draw that to Mr. McMurdo's attention (Day 7 - 784 and 785). No such question was raised. Only Hamilton's fitness to run a boys' camp was in question. It is thus submitted, sir, that the decision not to revoke Hamilton's firearms certificate on the basis of Inchmoan was correct and certainly within the scope of a reasonable exercise of discretion. There is nothing in the events which suggest that Hamilton was a danger to the public arising out of or in connection with his possession of a firearm. Looked at in context the slapping of the children could not be said to be of a gratuitous nature giving rise to any question of Hamilton's stability or aggression. His ability as a youth leader does not, it is submitted, reflect on his ability to be in possession of a firearm without danger to the public. In any event, views on his ability were mixed.

The next incident, sir, was that which took place in the house in Linlithgow. That was a complaint which was made to Lothian and Borders Police who investigated. They did investigate it and they chose to take no proceedings. In fact, there isn't even any evidence to suggest that they considered it worthy of a report to the Procurator-Fiscal. Because Hamilton was a certificated firearms holder in Central Scotland Police the details were sent to the Central Scotland Police Force and were drawn to Mr. McMurdo's attention because of his position as the firearms officer. He placed great reliance on the statements which had been taken by the Lothian and Borders Police, namely that there had been an invitation extended to Hamilton to go to the house with firearms, that none of the occupants of the house were alarmed, there had been no ammunition present, and the parents were happy that their children be photographed by them, the parents, in possession -- or rather holding the firearm/firearm. I dispute that the children were actually in possession of it at the time and that possession was still that of Mr. Hamilton.

The only suggestion which came through the enquiry was that Sergeant McGrane thought that there had been some feeling that the householders were not at home with Hamilton bringing guns to the house. There is not a hint of that in the written statements and there is not a hint that that was drawn to Central Scotland Police's attention.

It is submitted, sir, that that event should not give rise to any suggestion that there be a revocation although with hindsight Mr. McMurdo was prepared to accept that one reasonable course of action which he may have taken would have been the sending of a warning letter.

We then reach Milarrochy Bay 1991 Camp. Documents, of which there are many, disclose a number of complaints and it is essential these should be grouped into three groups. One is assault, two is camp supervision and the third is photographs. A report was sent to the Procurator-Fiscal at Stirling. After some discussion there was a decision to take no proceedings on the basis of both lack of criminality and not in the public interest. In my submission, sir, it is not difficult to see why that view was reached.

If I can take the three groupings, namely that of assault, camp supervision and photographs: in my submission, sir, viewed objectively it appears that one child caused a problem at the camp by gratuitously assaulting or bullying another on the football pitch. He was chastised for his efforts. Shortly thereafter he again gratuitously assaulted the same child and Hamilton chastised him more severely. The same child then threw a stone and hit another on the eye and he was again chastised. Many would view the conduct of Hamilton as wholly appropriate if proper discipline was to be maintained at the camp.

However, Detective Sergeant Hughes thought otherwise. He considered that the disciplining of the child constituted an assault and that it demonstrated Hamilton was capable of violence. It also formed the basis for Hughes' view/view, expressed in his memo, that Hamilton was unstable in that he had demonstrated loss of control. However, Hughes did acknowledge that the chastisement of the children could rationally be viewed as the proper exercise of control by Hamilton (Day 7 - 909, Day 8 - 919 and 924). He also considered that Hamilton's chastisement of the child fell within the band of responses which might be expected of an adult (Day 8 - 918 and 924).

Sir, it is submitted that the assault or chastisement does not constitute gratuitous violence and that this conduct no more disqualified Hamilton as being considered unsuited to hold a firearm than it would a father who is a strict disciplinarian with his own child. On any objective view, it is submitted that chastisement of a child in the circumstances described does not demonstrate an unstable character.

The second section is that of supervision. These essentially are echoes of what was said of the Inchmoan Camp in 1988. In my submission, sir, these must be taken in the context that some parents were quite happy to leave the children at the camp. When statements were taken from parents, many were supportive of Hamilton (Day 13 - 1566 to 1567). However, in any event, lack of proper supervision at a camp does not, it is submitted, give rise to a concern that Hamilton was likely to cause danger to the public arising from his possession of a firearm.

One is then left solely with the question of the photographs and the subject matter of these photographs. None of the photographs taken by Hamilton at the camp were considered by Hughes to be indecent (Day 7 - 894 and Day 8 - 919). The weight of evidence does suggest that Hamilton was less than open in his dealings with the police. Photographs of six developed rolls of film were handed in to the police but there are reasonable grounds for believing that eight rolls were handed in to a photography shop for development. This does suggest that Hamilton was not being wholly truthful. No further attempt appeared to have been made to question him on that at the time.

It may be suggested that the failure to disclose the existence of the two rolls of film makes/makes Hamilton a person dishonest in his dealings with the police and thus not a suitable person to be entrusted with a firearm. In fact, that is what is suggested. McMurdo did not expect that every firearms certificate holder needed to be honest in his dealings with the police (Day 13 - I601 and I602).

In light of some of the reported decisions it is submitted that this is not an unreasonable view.

Sir, in the case of Spencer-Stewart and the Chief Constable of Kent, to which I have already referred -- I accept this was a case dealing with a shotgun -- the Court held that notwithstanding offences for assault with occasional actual bodily harm, handling stolen goods, theft, obtaining property by deception and 15 other offences of a similar nature, all between 1976 and 1978, and a conviction for handling stolen property in 1987, the applicant was entitled to retain his shotgun certificate in 1988. It was a distinguished Bench and it was the present Lord Chief Justice who gave one of the leading judgments.

Handling stolen property is the English equivalent of reset, and according to Gordon on Criminal Law (Second Edition) reset is defined as "The retention of goods obtained by theft, robbery, fraud or embezzlement with the intention of keeping them from the true owner".

Sir, it is submitted that anybody who commits an act of reset could be described as a person who is scheming, devious, deceitful and untrustworthy. In Spencer-Stewart it was considered that although the applicant might well be given to the commission of offences, the offences in consideration were not such as would involve the "slightest risk or likelihood of use of a shotgun". That being so, the applicant was entitled to retain his shotgun certificate. The Chief Constable's view was not supported. Thus even with a description of the applicant fitting that given by Hughes to Hamilton, and in the case of Spencer-Stewart being 100 per cent accurate, plus a string of previous convictions involving violence and dishonesty, the Court of Appeal held that the applicant's shotgun certificate ought not to be revoked/revoked. The Court went further and said the grounds would not have justified grounds for refusal to renew.

I accept, sir, that different criteria apply to shotgun and firearms certificates. Section 28 does not carry with it the proviso that a certificate shall not be granted to a person of intemperate habits, of unsound mind or otherwise unfitted to be entrusted with a firearm.

It/

11.40 a.m.

It is respectfully submitted, however, that given the test, the composite test previously discussed, the difference between the considerations in the mind of a Chief Officer of Police when considering the revocation or refusal of a shotgun certificate as opposed to a firearms certificate are not significant.

Viewed against the level of dishonesty displayed by Spencer-Stewart, Hamilton could be said to be at the other end of the spectrum; yet the Court of Appeal did not support the Chief Constable's decision to revoke. In such circumstances, it is submitted that McMurdo's decision not to revoke was clearly within the proper exercise of his discretion.

It is also, sir, significant to have regard to the timing of the memorandum. There is no evidence to suggest that the two missing rolls of film were considered sufficiently significant in September, 1991 to justify applying for a search warrant to see if the photographs not surrendered by Hamilton could be found at his house.

However, some nine weeks later, after a report had been sent to the Procurator Fiscal, and after informal indications had been made that there were to be no proceedings, and further that a complaint was made against Hughes' handling of the investigation by Hamilton, the missing photographs contributed significantly to the basis for Hamilton being described as "scheming", "devious", "deceitful" and "not to be trusted". As Hughes conceded, it was possible that in writing the report he was not as objective as he might have been had the complaint by Hamilton against him not been made. On being asked when he knew of Hamilton holding a firearms certificate Hughes said that he did not recall (Day 7, p.900). The Inquiry subsequently learned that as a matter of course when a report was sent to the Fiscal a check was made on SCRO to ascertain if there were previous convictions. Such a check discloses whether the subject of the search is a firearms holder (Day 14, p.1685).

It is submitted that it is reasonable to infer that Hughes knew Hamilton was a firearms holder by 6th September, being the date he submitted his/his report to the Procurator Fiscal. Why he delayed in writing his memo until 11th November is not known. If he did know of the existence of the firearms certificate on 6th September, but waited until 11th November to express his concerns, one might wonder whether the concerns expressed were as strongly held as the memo made out.

At the time of its dictation Hughes would barely have considered it would be pored over to the extent it has, and that he would require to speak to it at a subsequent Inquiry of this nature.

McMurdo did consider that there was something in relation to the delay in informing him of the firearms certificate issue. He described it as a "pertinent" factor. It is clear from his evidence that he did not know exactly what to make of it (Day 12, p.1535).

Sir, the view expressed by Hughes of Hamilton in the memo relied "almost entirely" on his intuition as a police officer. He accepted that it might be difficult to put one's finger on hard and fast evidence to support the view expressed in the memorandum and that it came down to a gut feel at the end of the day (Day 8, p. 924).

On considering the papers after they had been submitted to him, McMurdo formed the same view. He agreed that Hamilton was a controversial figure, but felt the whole memo from Hughes was no more than an impression. There was no evidence to substantiate the conclusion. A gut feeling would not be enough.

You, sir, are able to look at the evidence. It is all there. All the papers which were available to both parties are before you, and I invite you to draw your own conclusions as to whether or not the memorandum can meet the evidence.

McMurdo, however, was not alone in considering that the content of the statements did not support what was said in the memorandum. Ian MacKenzie, a former superintendent of police, was of the same view. In the week before he gave his evidence he had been asked to consider for the first time the papers relating to Inchmoan and Milarrochy. He saw the papers which accompanied the report to the Fiscal by Strathclyde Police into Inchmoan and also/also the papers accompanying Hughes' report to the Fiscal at Stirling. Neither incident would have caused him to revoke Hamilton's firearms certificate. He did not think the statements contained in the Hughes memo were supported by the evidence. He saw no evidence that Hamilton was unstable. He saw no evidence that Hamilton had assaulted a child due to cracking under stress, and he found no evidence that Hamilton had been dishonest to the extent that revocation was warranted.

McMurdo did not accept the description of Hamilton as painted by Hughes. He too had met with Hamilton in October, 1989 and had corresponded with him regularly thereafter as Hamilton pursued his complaint against the police. He knew Hamilton's argument in favour of maintaining a strict regime. He knew the argument for the boys wearing trunks. He had been able to form his own view of Hamilton's personality. He did not form the view that Hamilton was either irrational or unstable (Day 13, p.1559).

After consultation with his Chief Superintendent John Millar he chose to take no action. It was suggested to McMurdo that he ought to have spoken to Hughes before deciding to take no action. Had McMurdo not otherwise known of Hamilton and had he not met with the man it might have been unreasonable for McMurdo to have made no inquiry of Hughes. However, McMurdo knew Hamilton better than anybody else in CSP knew him. It could hardly be otherwise, given the volume of correspondence he had had from the man. He was able to read the full details of the incident. It is important to note that this was not the first time that McMurdo had received notice of complaints about the 1991 camp. He had been informed right at the outset, he had been briefed by Mr. Holden, Mr. Hughes' superior, from an early stage, and he had even received Holden's note of the 12th August. He continued to have dialogue with senior officers throughout the investigation. He was in pole position to assess the facts and come to a view. "I knew all about the case. I had read it. I had spoken to a senior officer" (McMurdo, Day 12, p.1510).

Sir, in all the circumstances it is submitted/submitted that the memorandum prepared by Hughes was a memorandum which was not supported by the underlying evidence. It is the underlying evidence which must be looked at; it is not a description of the sort that one finds in the memorandum to which one must have regard; it is not a description which the Chief Officer of Police has to go on; it is the underlying facts he has to go on when he comes to a view about the suitability of an applicant to hold a firearms certificate. It is clear that McMurdo's view was correct.

We now turn to look at the events that occurred post-Millarochy. The first of these is that which occurred at Dunblane High School camp being run by Hamilton in 1992. That is the one where three boys inappropriately dressed tried to telephone their parents circa 10 o'clock at night.

Now, the circumstances of how they came to leave school have not been properly explored. It is perfectly possible that Hamilton was completely blameless. Which of us who can remember days at camp cannot recall pranks which by their occurrence might suggest carelessness on the part of those in charge but where the reality was that they occurred because of the devilment of youth. No school can be made 100% secure, since to do so would render the building to be a fire trap. Whether the boys therefore escaped because of Hamilton's lack of supervision or because they were particularly resourceful is not a question which can be answered.

The subsequent complaints to the police all centred on one theme, albeit with a few different strands. The principal theme was the taking of photographs by Hamilton at various boys' clubs. There is no evidence that the boys were concerned; their parents were. The incidents are summarised in D3/1(i), and I won't go through them here.

A report was made to the Fiscal at Stirling, and of considerable significance, a search warrant was requested but refused, which suggests to the police that there was no reasonable grounds to suspect a crime was being committed.

The police inquiries continued, and after initial reluctance the Scout Association permitted/permitted access to their files. The purpose of the examination was to see if there was anything contained therein which would be of assistance to the general investigation.

The then Detective Constable Taylor noted certain views of Hamilton expressed in the file and attributed to Mr. Brian Fairgrieve. Taylor was particularly concerned with the description of Hamilton as being "mentally unbalanced". Taylor knew that Hamilton was a firearms certificate holder and he knew of the concerns which had been expressed by Hughes. He shared these concerns, but only because he relied on what had been said by Hughes (Day 18, pp.2179 and 2190). A meeting with Fairgrieve was arranged. Fairgrieve cannot recall this meeting (Day 4, p.480). When interviewed by Taylor, Fairgrieve described Hamilton as having grandiose delusions of his own ability and being a bully towards children. He said that a description of Hamilton as mentally unstable was not his view. A medical examination would have been required before such could be said (Day 18, pp. 2186 and 2187). Having grandiose delusions and being a bully did not cause concern to Taylor in relation to Hamilton's continued entitlement to possess firearms.

It is further submitted, sir, that having heard the evidence from the psychiatrists and psychologists, there was no evidence to support a finding of him being grandiose and a bully.

Further photographs came into possession of the police, and a further meeting was held with the Procurator Fiscal at Stirling. Again, the view expressed was that there was no criminal offence.

The officers now felt that the way to give some credence to the complaints which were being made against Hamilton would be if the clubs he was running could be stopped, and their efforts were in the future focussed towards that. Just to make sure that no stone was left unturned, Taylor made contact with the Metropolitan Police to see if they knew of Hamilton through their sources. This enquiry also drew a blank.

It is submitted that all of these investigations were thoroughly carried out by Central/

Central Scotland Police, with no stone being left unturned; but nothing was brought to light which should have caused any concern about Hamilton owning a gun or possessing a gun. There was no criminal activity involved, there was nothing more than suspicion regarding his activities at the club, and these suspicions centred on his exploits with a camera. The adverse comments made of Hamilton in the Scout file and which came to light during this investigation in no way impinge upon an individual's entitlement to hold firearms. Taylor's view on this matter, it is respectfully suggested, was correct, even if the information was not conveyed to McMurdo; and this we do not know, since McMurdo was never asked, and neither was Moffat.

However, sir, McMurdo was still concerned that these rumours and reports persisted, continued to be made, and he was not prepared to leave it there. He asked the then Inspector Holden to meet with Hamilton and to address the concerns of the parents. Sergeant Moffat and Holden met with Hamilton in October, 1993. During the meeting Hamilton remained calm and was "quite articulate". He was asked about the formation of a committee for the boys' club, but he evaded this question. Holden thought he was lying. He was challenged about being homosexual, which he denied. He remained composed, and as he had with McMurdo two years earlier, and justified the manner in which he ran the clubs and camps.

Holden's view of Hamilton's character following the meeting was that he was not unstable (Day 7, p.880). It had been this aspect which had concerned Holden most in 1991 in relation to the content of the Hughes memo. Holden acknowledged that if "unstable" correctly described Hamilton, then Holden did not consider him to be a fit person to hold a firearms certificate.

At this stage, sir, I would like to look at Holden's view in relation to 1991, since some time was spent on that by Mr. Campbell.

Holden agreed that the question which was posed by Hughes was a correct and appropriate question to pass up the line to those involved with firearms (p.871). What he says, however, was that he was relying on Hughes, since he had not met with Hamilton./

Hamilton. His view could only be a secondhand view, and Hughes' view was first hand. He agreed that if instability was correct then Hamilton should not have a firearm.

He did not agree in the cross-examination which was given to him by Mr. Campbell that if a person was a liar then that necessarily precluded him from holding a firearm. He did however consider it might be part of a reason for refusing a firearms certificate.

It is significant, sir, that after the meeting he had with Hamilton he did not think Hamilton to be unstable. He reported his views back to McMurdo after that interview.

Holden's recollection is that in the course of the discussion McMurdo commented that the opinion of Hamilton expressed by Holden was the same opinion as that of McMurdo, which he had formed two years earlier (Day 7, pp.879 and 880). McMurdo saw the view being expressed by Holden as a change in Holden's position (Day 7, p.1594). That would be correct if McMurdo previously thought Holden to be of the view that Hamilton was unstable, as stated in the Hughes' memo.

The next aspect which requires to be considered is that of the correspondence into which Hamilton entered with the police. One sees this in its full range in chapter K.

Now, sir, Hamilton took issue with the Scouts, the police and the local authorities, and on each occasion he did no more than exercise his legal rights, albeit with a dogged determination.

McMurdo was one of Hamilton's principal correspondents, and he eventually "lost his cool", as he put it, when he saw another line of correspondence opening, at Hamilton's instance, with the Scottish Office. This coincided with a complaint to McMurdo by P.C. Gunn, who was seeking advice as to whether he should take legal action against Hamilton in respect of some of the comments being made of Gunn by Hamilton in Hamilton's circulars to parents (Day 12, pp.1480 and 1524; Day 13, p.1569).

In/

In an effort to persuade the Scottish Office not to take up Hamilton's cause, and thus involve McMurdo in further correspondence, McMurdo wrote to the Scottish Office a letter dated 14th January, 1992 in rather intemperate terms.

The/

12 noon

The letter, however, served its purpose. It stopped the correspondence.

On your invitation, sir, McMurdo considered that he would choose to withdraw the words "evermore irrational outpourings" from the letter and generally tone it down (Day 12, p.1524).

In the whole correspondence, however, there is never a threat made by Hamilton. We have now seen the reports prepared by Mr. Baird who, having read the correspondence, did not consider it suggested that Hamilton was irrational. That is perhaps confirmation that McMurdo was correct to withdraw the passage which he did, sir, on your invitation.

Now, I think it was Professor Cooke who considered that the writing of the letter could even have been a release for Hamilton although I don't think that that was a factor which was considered by the police at that time.

Notwithstanding his comments in the letter, McMurdo did not believe the correspondence gave cause for concern that Hamilton would be untrustworthy. However, certain expressions in the letter seemed to give cause for concern to some of the parties at the inquiry and point to an opposite conclusion from that which was formed by McMurdo.

Something was made of Mr. McMurdo's use of the term "right minded people". It is a phrase which features in a number of McMurdo's letters and he acknowledged that he used it quite a bit. By so using it, he meant "ordinary people" (p.1570).

"Zealot" was another word used and defined by McMurdo as "somebody who pursues a cause with great determination" (p.1571). It is respectfully suggested that this is an accurate definition and it is also an apt description of Hamilton but not a description which necessarily implies that the man should not have a firearm.

You, sir, took up the description of Hamilton as being someone whose views lacked perspective at least in relation to Hamilton's dispute/dispute with the Scouts. McMurdo thought he had been "churlish" in the use of that description, given the time given by Hamilton to his boys clubs.

It is interesting to note, sir, that although it is McMurdo's perception of Hamilton which is of relevance at this stage, nonetheless the Scouts in fact did view Hamilton as a rival at local level. That is Woolhead (Day 9, p.1066).

Complainers such as Hamilton are sadly not unique to the police as McMurdo described (pp.1572-1573). Michael Forsyth confirmed that this was the case in his experience as well. Ian MacKenzie on Day 10 was cross-examined on whether he considered that because somebody had made a complaint against the police or another authority which turned out to be without foundation, whether that would in his view justify revocation of the firearms certificate. MacKenzie was not of that view (pp.1216, 1218 and 1219).

Sir, it is submitted that McMurdo was justified in not considering the correspondence which he had entered into with Hamilton, and which Hamilton exercised as a legal right, as justification for revocation or refusal of Hamilton's firearms certificate. Had it been so revoked or refused, one can only imagine what would have been said by those who champion the cause of civil rights.

We then reach, sir, the 1992 renewal. McMurdo was on holiday at this time. It was dealt with by Adamson. Adamson was familiar with Milarrochy and he knew about Hughes memo although he hadn't seen it. He was aware of the view taken by McMurdo and he was in daily contact with McMurdo. Adamson was also aware of the 1988 Inchmoan incident. He was also familiar with the terms of the correspondence between Hamilton and McMurdo. He himself had correspondence with the Scottish Office in McMurdo's absence (Day 13, pp.1605-1609). The letter which he wrote, 105K, clearly demonstrates an intimate knowledge of the communings with Hamilton, albeit that the letter had been prepared by another member of the Force.

It may be suggested that the test applied/applied by McMurdo when considering revocation would be a different test from that which Adamson required to apply when considering renewal. In particular, the requirement that he should be satisfied that Hamilton could possess a firearm without danger to the public safety or to the peace would technically not have been before McMurdo. Standing the submission I have previously made as to the composite test, that difference is one of form rather than substance.

Sir, it was further suggested that one should have regard to the cumulative effect of these events. In my submission, however, even if the events relating to Hamilton are looked at cumulatively it makes no difference to the decision. There are only two instances where it might be suggested there is assault and both are of the same genre. They are examples of over-chastisement of children. They were in 1988 and 1991 and in my submission, such does not give rise to an accumulation which results in a pre-disposition of violence to be concluded in respect of Hamilton.

The only suggestion of a cumulative effect can be, it is submitted, in relation to the incidents which occurred post-Millarrochy where one had a number of complaints made by parents who were suspicious of what motivated Hamilton to take photographs of their sons. On each occasion, however, there was never anything more than a suspicion that what Hamilton was doing was unwholesome. There was nothing tangible in any one incident. At the risk of being facetious -- nothing plus nothing equals nothing.

One must also beware of the bandwagon effect. There was a concern at this time that Hamilton might have been the subject of a witch hunt. McMurdo put it thus (Day 12, p.1489) "They (the complaints) all centred round the wearing of shorts and a bare top. There was no one single photograph that I have seen, and I have seen hundreds and hundreds of them, which are in any way indecent. Things almost had reached a witch hunt by that time. Rumours were circulating about the town but there was nothing, nothing at all, in all the photographs we looked at. There was not one we found that was in any way indecent".

Whether/

Whether a Chief Officer of Police can act on suspicions is addressed in the joint submission. It is said in paragraphs 42 to 45 on page 25 that if the police were given wider discretion to refuse certificates, they might find it easier to exclude applicants whom they suspected of being unreasonable. It is suggested that the police might take into account suspicions, incapable of proof, that the person is unsuitable. The Home Secretary and Secretary of State for Scotland have a difficulty with this proposal. They consider it would be unfair on the applicant if the suspicion turned out to be groundless. It was also suggested that the Chief Officer might have problems in sustaining his decision on appeal because the Courts could certainly expect him to have valid reasons for his decision.

Had Mr. McMurdo been taken to appeal, he would have felt the same way as George Robertson, the Shadow Secretary of State, felt when he took up Hamilton's activities with Michael Forsyth which he described (Day 15, p.1808) in the following way; "I have to say when confronted by Mr. Forsyth's questions to me about what precisely I was talking about, what precise evidence I had, what it was exactly I was complaining about, I found myself in the same difficulties that so many other people had, that it was difficult to put your finger on what people felt was wrong with Thomas Hamilton".

Based upon the totality of what was known in 1995, it is respectfully submitted that on appeal Mr. McMurdo would have had little prospect of being successful. In fact, sir, he would have had none. To have refused Hamilton's application would thus have been an unreasonable exercise of his discretion.

When McMurdo, therefore, came to consider the renewal of Hamilton's firearms certificate in 1995 he had to, and did, take account of all information available to him. He did not rubber stamp as was suggested yesterday by Mr. Campbell. In fact there is, in my submission, sir, not a jot of evidence contained in the transcripts to support that very serious submission. No evidence was suggested yesterday, no evidence was put forward to you, sir, to support the view that what McMurdo did in 1995 was a rubber stamping exercise./

exercise. One might have expected there to have been such a quotation if there was any substance to such a serious allegation. The true position, however, may be found on Day 12 at p.1503 where Mr. McMurdo was answering questions put to him by Mr. Campbell. What was said there by Mr. McMurdo was "I thought through the various actions which had affected Mr. Hamilton over the years and I signed the certificate". He acknowledged that it didn't take him a great length of time, a few minutes, but to suggest that what he was doing was rubber stamping is in my submission, sir, not supported at all by the evidence.

Further, sir, yesterday much was made of McMurdo not having had resort to the firearms file. Sir, he had much more than would ever be in this firearms file or any other firearms file. Perhaps because of the size of Central Scotland Police, he also was in charge of complaints and discipline. He therefore had all these papers to consider. They comprise four Lever Arches in this Inquiry. That perhaps is indicative of the small size of Central Scotland Police Force and it perhaps marks out why the procedures which are adopted in one Force need not necessarily be the best practice in a different Force.

Apart from the display of weapons to the family in Linlithgow, when McMurdo came to consider all the relevant factors he would have had to find that there was no evidence of any impropriety with a shotgun or a firearm. The letters by this time had started to tail off (p.1568). The three reports to the Fiscal had not resulted in any Court action, let alone conviction, this lending some support to the view formed by McMurdo of the various incidents. There had even been a refusal of an application for a search warrant, suggesting that there was not even reasonable suspicion that a crime had been committed. Furthermore, no senior officer who had met with Hamilton had considered him a danger with a firearm. Holden's view of Hamilton's character coincided with that of McMurdo after Holden's interview in October of 1993. Apart from the two incidents at the camps in 1988 and 1991, there was no suggestion of violence on Hamilton's part. Quite the reverse. Although not asked, it would be improbable if McMurdo was unaware of the incident when flour, etc., was thrown at Hamilton/

Hamilton and was borne by him with fortitude. No photographs were recovered of an indecent nature. A great many positive comments were made of Hamilton by others. There was never a suggestion of Hamilton drinking to excess. The only suggestion of drugs came from the master of clinical acumen, Mr. Fairgrieve, who in 1986 in a private memo, which he shared with nobody and prepared following a meeting with Hamilton, said he wouldn't be surprised if Hamilton was on psychiatric drugs. His medical records, that is Hamilton's medical records, disclosed that there was never any psychiatric disorder, he never was on drugs and the post mortem confirms this.

Given the foregoing, sir, it is submitted that McMurdo was entitled to hold the view that his only concern was whether Hamilton's actions towards the boys in the clubs and camps were totally wholesome and that he never dreamt that Hamilton would be dangerous with a firearm (Day 12, p.1552).

As Mr. Cameron said (Day 21, p.2488) "There is a practical difficulty, if there is no tangible, transparent, verifiable evidence then there is grave difficulty in taking any form of regulatory control".

It is submitted that in so far as Hamilton was concerned, there was no tangible, verifiable evidence to demand a revocation or refusal to renew his firearms certificate.

When one performs an administrative task such as McMurdo had to do and, sir, in my submission it is an administrative task and not a judicial function as was suggested by Mr. Campbell yesterday, there is no single correct course of action and I quote "The very concept of administrative discretion involves a right to choose between more than one permissible course of action, upon which there is room for reasonable people to hold differing opinions as to which is to be preferred". Those are the words of Lord Diplock in the case of SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EDUCATION AND SCIENCE v. TAMESIDE METROPOLITAN BOROUGH COUNCIL (1977) AC 1014, quoting from page 1064.

Sir, it is submitted that the decisions taken by McMurdo in the history of the file and, in particular,/ particular, the decision in 1995 to renew the firearms certificate were decisions which fell within the description of permissible courses of action.

It is perhaps easy, given the events of the 13th March, to say that there must have been a failure on somebody's part to allow Hamilton to retain his entitlement to possess firearms. To say Hughes was correct and McMurdo and the others were wrong is a great temptation. However, sir, to so say is to put the facts of 13th March into the equation. They should be excluded because otherwise it is being wise after the event.

If society allows handguns to be owned by individuals and possessed by them in their own premises, it is submitted that no system will be foolproof and prevent such an individual from making wrongful and sometimes murderous use of such weapons.

Sir, I would now like to address the culture in which Central Scotland Police operated. As with other police forces, they do not act in a vacuum. How they go about their business is conditioned by many external factors. Two major influences are the Scottish Office in its own right and acting through Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary. Both of these bodies have in recent times been making their views known on the licensing of firearms.

The Government has extended the life of the firearm certificate from 3 to 5 years. HMCIC has been urging police forces to (a) introduce renewal of firearms certificate by post (b) abandon the need for a counter-signatory (c) civilianise the investigation of applicants (d) provide a quality service and value for money to the shooting community which the police are told pays for the service provided by the police in relation to firearms licensing and (e) set specific target times for the completion of a grant or renewal of a firearms certificate.

What does the foregoing, taken in the round, say to the police? There are two clear messages. (1) the renewal of a firearms certificate is more appropriate work for a civilian to/to undertake and police officers are best utilised in other areas and (2) that the renewal of a firearms certificate should be made easier, cheaper and faster. The emphasis is on co-operating with the shooting community.

The Home Office requirements for there to be a proposer and seconder for membership of a gun club has been reduced to requiring a proposer only. The minimum probationary period for club membership has been reduced from six to three months.

Thus should you, sir, in spite of this submission find the procedures adopted by Central Scotland Police and the decision making function to be less rigorous than you would have chosen, the culture in which the Force operates must be borne in mind. If Central Scotland Police or any one of their officers did get it wrong, one must look to the top of the tree. It is from the top of the tree that example is given and the tone set. In terms of a police force that can mean in Scotland only one office. The Scottish Office.

Given the climate created by the Government in relation to the administration of firearms, it is grossly unfair for society to suggest that one individual police officer or group of police officers should shoulder the blame for something so horrendous as took place on the 13th March.

It/

12.20 p.m.

It is respectfully submitted, Sir, that renewals should not be by post, a certificate should last for three years, the counter-signatory provision should be strengthened, not abolished, and no pressure should be brought to bear to have an application for grant or renewal completed within a specified period. The position taken by the Government should be reversed. They should go through 180 degrees.

Finally, Sir, it behoves me to look at the causative effect, since you were addressed by Mr. Campbell on causation. Perhaps it is surprising at an Inquiry of this nature that one needs to address that.

However, we have already discussed the criticisms that have been levelled at the Central Scotland Police procedures, and our comments upon them. Some are accepted as valid, others are rejected.

It is submitted, however, that even if accepted in their entirety, none of the alleged failures of practice or procedure resulted in a decision to grant Hamilton a firearms certificate in circumstances where it might otherwise have been refused.

Whatever view is ultimately taken on the efficiency of the Enquiry Officers and Firearms Department in ingathering information on Hamilton, and in referring that information to the decision-maker, all relevant and available information which might have had a bearing on his suitability was given due consideration in the course of deliberations over Hamilton's firearms certificate. No information which might have influenced the decision and which could or should have been known to the decision-maker and was not, has been brought to light in the course of the Inquiry.

It might be suggested that Criminal Intelligence was not tapped as a source of information in the course of the enquiries, nor did it contain all the information which it might when it was so tapped.

It/

It is accepted that none of the various Criminal Intelligence entries recorded of Hamilton over the years ever made their way to the firearms file, nor did the Smith incident, Hughes' enquiry, nor the Taylor Report ever make their way to Criminal Intelligence. Criminal Intelligence was not regularly checked in the course of Hamilton's various applications for grant and renewal. When it was, it was thought to contain no information of relevance, and its contents were not referred to the decision-maker.

Until 1990 there was no Force instruction to review Criminal Intelligence. However, John Brown thought that he would have made such a check in 1989. If he did, by January 1989 a series of entries relating to Hamilton would have been disclosed to him.

He did not comment upon them in the RL3a, nor did he bring them to the attention of his superiors. It is not difficult to see why. Some of the entries which were on the manual system and classified as "Intelligence" stretch the meaning of the word to its limits. The purpose of the first entry appeared to be as I have already said to draw attention to Hamilton's suspected homosexuality; the second seemed to be from a disgruntled member of the Transport Police; the third is a brief summary of the Inchmoan complaint; and the fourth, fifth and sixth are simply newspaper cuttings.

However, had these entries been brought to McMurdo's attention he confirmed (I588 and I589) that they would not have influenced him nor made any difference to his decision. He did, of course, know all about Inchmoan, and the Intelligence could tell him nothing.

Between 1990 and 1994 the Force Criminal Intelligence system went through a number of changes -- and I don't propose to address you, Sir, at length on these.

It might also be suggested, Sir, that Ann Anderson's "gut feeling" should have been reported to her superiors. She did not consider it to be a matter which could be narrated on the RL3a form. She could not formulate her feeling into a reason to recommend refusal. She could not quantify the/the feeling, but did say that whatever it was she would not have put him as any kind of risk (Day II, 1393).

However, assuming again that her decision in this respect was flawed, such a narrative would not have resulted in a different decision being taken in 1995.

Constable Anderson again could have told Mr. McMurdo nothing new. He knew all about Hamilton and of people's feelings about him. He also knew that whatever those feelings were, with the sole exception of Paul Hughes, they did not relate to him being a risk with a gun. His decision would have remained unchanged.

In summary, whatever flaws might therefore be alleged in the process of storing, recording and accessing information relative to Hamilton, or of the Enquiry Officer's efficiency in identifying and reporting upon that information, it made -- to use Mr. McMurdo's words -- "not one whit of difference".

A recurring criticism of Central Scotland Police procedures was their failure to address past usage of the firearms and ammunition in testing Hamilton's "good reason". This was a theme which permeated Mr. Richardson's evidence in particular. You have already been addressed, Sir, at length on this criticism, and the reasons for its rejection.

However, assuming again for the moment that he is correct and Central Scotland Police should have reviewed Hamilton's use of the firearms certificate to identify whether he was making use of his arms, what would such a review have disclosed? As previously submitted to you, he was making use of the firearms, and nowhere is it suggested in the Guidance or anywhere that there is any minimum usage. Indeed, there is even a reference in the Guidance to each case being determined on its own merits, and there being no arbitrary limit.

You have already been addressed on Hamilton's club attendance. In the absence of any specified definition or standard for "regular use", it cannot be said on the basis of the available evidence/evidence that Hamilton would not have satisfied the "use" criteria or failed, even on the Richardson test, to establish good reason.

The evidence before the Inquiry does not allow us to say whether Hamilton could have satisfied the "use" criteria for every firearm he held. We have already discussed the fact that the procedures and records currently practised and maintained by gun clubs throughout the period of review would not accommodate such a check. Even if it had, it is reasonable to assume from Hamilton's attendance that he must have been using at least one firearm, and even on the stringent Richardson test, would therefore have satisfied "good reason" for at least one firearm. Sir, that was all it took.

Central Scotland Police did not make checks with gun clubs to enquire of the "behaviour" of an applicant before renewing his certificate. They did not do so with Hamilton. However, had they done so they would have been told nothing that would have justified refusal. Although Crawford, Smith, Campbell and Wood all gave evidence to the effect that Hamilton shot rapidly, his handling of firearms was always considered safe.

Even with the benefit of hindsight, the Stirling Rifle and Pistol Club could not identify anything in his behaviour at the club which should have prompted action by them. They were strict on safety and discipline, and Hamilton complied with those strictures.

If the club cannot now identify any behaviour which should have merited action, it is reasonable to assume that they would have expressed no concern had a police enquiry been made.

Whatever comments might have been expressed about the speed of fire, CSP would have been told that Hamilton was a safe and disciplined club member and that his behaviour gave the club no reason to take action or to reconsider membership.

In addition, CSP did not at any time seek a medical or psychiatric report on Hamilton. There was some suggestion that Mr. McMurdo might have questioned Hamilton's mental health in light of the copious and persistent correspondence which he received/received.

However, even had such a referral been made we now know from the evidence the psychiatrists and psychologists have given to this Inquiry that the correspondence did not and would not have disclosed Hamilton as being mentally ill, or as having any personality disorder.

Indeed, even if he had been medically examined, as opposed to simply the correspondence being looked at, in light of the submission which I have already made on the weight which you, Sir, should attach to the psychiatrists' and psychologists' reports, it is improbable that anything would have come of such an investigation.

The amount of ammunition held has also been the subject of comment. The criticism appears to be that he held too much. We have already addressed you on this point, Sir, and I won't go over that again.

However, whether Hamilton had authority to hold or purchase too much ammunition is, it is submitted, neither here nor there. It took only 105 rounds to wreak the havoc of the day. These bullets could have been manufactured at home, had he chosen to do so. The component parts can be purchased without any authorisation or certification. As this Inquiry has already heard, home made bullets are just as fatal.

Finally, what if Central Scotland Police had not authorised Hamilton to hold a firearm? Can it be said with any confidence that this terrible tragedy would not have occurred, perhaps in a slightly different form? The answer to that question is No.

There are estimated to be 1 million legal weapons in circulation (Penn, Day 22).

Joe Jackson expressed the opinion that Hamilton was not the type of person likely to obtain one of these illegal guns. Unfortunately, or fortunately, depending on your viewpoint, Mr. Jackson's view as to the type of person Hamilton was appears to have been based upon what he had read and heard in the Press and media. While he was subsequently/subsequently reminded by Mr. Campbell that he had received a summary of evidence, that did not appear to have weighed heavily in Mr. Jackson's assessment, and obviously did not come to mind when confirming the sources on which he based his opinion. Also, we never saw these summaries, and we were told they were selective.

Mr. Jackson's opinion was also based upon his knowledge of the criminal fraternity in Glasgow. It would appear, therefore, that what Mr. Jackson's evidence adds up to is that if Hamilton was the type of person which the Press say he was he could not have obtained an illegal gun in Glasgow.

Does this assist the debate? The Press reports can hardly be taken as an accurate character assessment and we do not know whether the criminal fraternity in areas other than Glasgow might have different criteria. Equally, one cannot exclude the possibility, as Mr. Jackson said, of Hamilton obtaining a gun from friends or acquaintances who attended gun clubs. Again, he appears to dismiss this possibility on the basis of assumptions formed from the media, not only about Hamilton's personality but about those he knew who held guns.

Jackson's opinion ignores the fact that Hamilton was a determined individual apparently so intent on his murderous acts that he planned them with great and meticulous detail. If an individual is capable of embarking upon such a deed with such dogged determination, and to have within him the capability of carrying it through in such horrific detail, down to the cutting of telephone wires to delay assistance, and the organisation of his guns and magazines to prevent any hitches, is it not fair to say that the acquisition of a firearm from somewhere would not have stood in his way?

Sir, I have already indicated that I do not propose to address you on the aspects of credibility and reliability of witnesses, since that has been very ably covered by the learned Dean of Faculty.

I do not therefore propose to say anything further to you, Sir, unless you have any further questions.

LORD CULLEN: Just one matter. You, in the course of your submissions, made some reference/reference to what the law should be with regard to changes. I take it you don't want to add anything to that?

MR. TAYLOR: I don't, Sir. This morning a document was produced to Mr. Bonomy containing the lessons which have been learned by Central Scotland Police, and they do to an extent touch upon the aspects which might be thought of as requiring change.

LORD CULLEN: Is that before the Inquiry now, that document? I don't know what its status is?

MR. TAYLOR: I am quite happy it be before the Inquiry.

LORD CULLEN: Well, that means it is made public. Are you content with that?

MR. TAYLOR: I am perfectly content with that.

LORD CULLEN: So that there is no misunderstanding.

MR. TAYLOR: There is no misunderstanding.

LORD CULLEN: Well, it hasn't reached me yet. No doubt it will.

MR. BONOMOY: I am sorry. I thought this was a copy for me. Unfortunately, I have written markings on it.....

MR. TAYLOR: I have a copy here.

LORD CULLEN: Well, it can reach me in due course. And I take it that is adopted by you in so far as it bears on your position?

MR. TAYLOR: Indeed, yes.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you, Mr. Taylor. There is one other matter I should mention at this stage. I have received a written closing submission made by Mr. Steven, the solicitor who represented Ronald George Taylor, the head teacher, and/and I don't think it is necessary for that to be read out, but I want to make sure it is noted publicly that has been received. Of course, copies will be made available to any member of the Press or the public who wants to see that. So that is part of the submissions before me at this stage.

I think that completes all the parties' submissions, which I think makes me now turn to Mr. Scoggins in case there is any matter you want to address me on in accordance with the invitation which I gave to you.

MR. CRUIKSHANK: Before Mr. Scoggins addresses you, my name is Cruikshank. I understand you are prepared to hear a motion from me at this stage to be allowed to address the Inquiry on behalf of those for whom I act, namely Stirling Rifle and Pistol Club, Callander Rifle and Pistol Club and their office-bearers and members.

LORD CULLEN: What is your object in seeking to address me?

MR. CRUIKSHANK: Simply to clarify some points which have been raised in the course of the addresses by the other parties.

LORD CULLEN: I am not sure what you mean by "clarification". Is there some error that you want to have corrected?

MR. CRUIKSHANK: There is a comment I can make, Sir, on their evidence -- correcting errors is indeed what I have in mind.

LORD CULLEN: Just to be quite clear, you want to respond, is that right, to what some of the parties have said over the last day or so?

MR. CRUIKSHANK: That is so. It will take a very short time.

LORD CULLEN: You do appreciate I don't want this to be used as an opportunity to state your case, which you have got already stated in writing -- you understand that?

MR. CRUIKSHANK: Indeed, Sir, I am very conscious of that. I am also conscious I have put in/in a submission which I would not be repeating.

LORD CULLEN: How long are you likely to be in your comments?

MR. CRUIKSHANK: 10 minutes.

LORD CULLEN: What I think I will do, I will extend to you the same invitation as Mr. Scoggins, so if you like to address me first at this point, we will hear you first and then Mr. Scoggins afterwards.

MR. CRUIKSHANK: I am obliged. I act on behalf of Stirling Rifle and Pistol Club, Callander Rifle and Pistol Club and their office-bearers and members. My name is Cruikshank. I am a solicitor in private practice.

LORD CULLEN: Perhaps you could bring the microphone a bit closer to you.

MR. CRUIKSHANK: I said, Sir, I act on behalf of Stirling Rifle and Pistol Club, Callander Rifle and Pistol Club and their office-bearers and members. I am a solicitor in private practice in Aberdeen.

Those instructing me wish first of all to express on their behalf their heartfelt sympathy to the relatives of the deceased and to the injured parties in connection with this matter.

Both clubs are long-established, well-conducted, Home Office approved clubs. Such approval involves adherence to particular rules laid down from time to time by the Scottish Office.

Written submissions were prepared and submitted on behalf of both clubs, and they have been accepted as evidence to the Inquiry under Reference Nos. I54, for Stirling Club and I55 for Callander Club.

With reference to the overall submissions on behalf of the parties, I have the following comments:- Mr. Bonomy's submission makes reference to whether a probationer should be allowed to be range officer. This is a reference to the evidence of Nigel Bell (462, Day 4). Mr. Campbell in/

in his submission also made reference to this evidence. I would point out that Nigel Bell gave evidence in cross-examination to Mr. Campbell to the effect that he was a qualified range officer. This may be confused with the much more formal "range conducting officer" qualification, about which others gave evidence.

Associated with Mr. Bell's evidence is that of Mr. McCarthy, the Scottish Pistol Association Secretary (pp. 2561-2583, Day 21), who in answer to a question by Mr. Bonomy to the effect: would it surprise him to find a probationary member in charge of a rifle range, said that it would. He was not given the additional information from Mr. Bell's evidence, namely that Mr. Bell was a qualified range officer.

Mr. Taylor's submission included slightly misleading information about Thomas Hamilton's status as a member of the Callander Club, when he said that Mr. Wood (p. 442, Day 3) had given evidence that Thomas Hamilton was a member of Callander Club.

What I think Mr. Wood did say there in answer to a question from Mr. Bonomy to the effect "Did Hamilton become a member of the club?" was "I assume he did".

Further on in his evidence he stated that Hamilton attended the club for three to four years. Mr. Taylor also referred to Mr. Reid's evidence (p. 433, Day 3) in support of the proposition that Thomas Hamilton was a member of the Callander Club.

On/

12.40 p.m.

On reading this I notice that Mr. Reid claimed to have been the Secretary of the Callander Club for 30 years and said in answer to the question from Mr. Bonomy "Was Thomas Hamilton ever a member of Callander Rifle & Pistol Club? - Not to my recollection but I couldn't go back through the books as Central Scotland Police have them".

There is also evidence from John Gillespie at (Day 3 Page 347 and J. Moffat Day 3 at Page 354) to which Mr. Taylor did not refer tending to show that Hamilton was a member of Callander Rifle & Pistol Club. There is no direct evidence that he was ever a full member.

There is clear evidence that Thomas Hamilton was a member of Stirling Rifle & Pistol Club for a number of years and that he was proposed and seconded by members when he joined. There was some evidence that he arrived at the Stirling Club more or less by inheritance when a Club he claimed to have been a member of, but about which there was no evidence of his membership, ceased to exist. As a member of a Club existing at the time he would have been exempt, even by present-day Guidelines, from any probationary period in the Stirling Club.

Both Clubs would adopt the principal recommendations contained in submission No. 75 made by the Law Society of Scotland at Page 2. These are that the administration of firearms should be taken over by a National Firearms Licensing Authority. This would ensure that uniform standards were maintained throughout the country and a degree of expertise would be quickly acquired to the benefit of all concerned. The second matter pointed out by the Law Society of Scotland is that in their view no legislation can be implemented by the UK Government acting alone in view of the terms of the European Firearms Directive 91/477 which commits member states to harmonising firearms legislation. This directive has been enacted into the UK law by the Firearms Act (Amendment) Regulations, 1992. Both Clubs would, however, dissociate themselves from the view expressed at Paragraph 19 on Page 78 of that submission.

Those to whom to the Inquiry will report may/may take this opportunity to once again consolidate and amend the Firearms Acts. There has been much written and oral evidence given about the shortcomings of the present law and I will not repeat it all here. I would point out in relation to air pistols, for example, that a glaring anomaly exists whereby if the same weapons, firing the same projectile at the same velocity, is propelled by a gas such as carbon dioxide, as opposed to compressed air, it becomes a Part 1 firearm for which a certificate is required. I think in Mr. Campbell's submission reference was made to hollow point bullets with the suggestion that they be banned. All long-range match rifle shooting is carried out using such bullets which have been found to be aerodynamically superior to solid point bullets in high-powered rifles.

It is the view of both Clubs that, apart from consolidation and amendments to deal with perceived anomalies, the existing law relating to grant and renewal of firearms certificates is sufficiently restrictive and would, if properly applied by Central Scotland Police, have operated to deprive Thomas Hamilton of his firearms long before the tragic events of the 13th March 1996.

I would finally submit that both Clubs were and are well conducted and properly run Clubs and that no criticism can be levelled at them or their office bearers or members for any of their dealings, acts or omissions in relation to Thomas Hamilton. That is all I propose to say, sir.

LORD CULLEN: Mr. Scoggins, perhaps before you begin you may give me some indication of what you are proposing to speak about?

MR. SCOGGINS: I think I will take 15-30 minutes but that depends really on how many questions you have for me. I had intended to deal with matters in two sections, first to take some of the points which came out yesterday during the submissions of Mr. Gibb and Mr. Taylor concerning such devious things as the meaning of the Section 27 proviso, the Home Office criteria, collecting, which you yourself raised, and that will take most of the time. I have a few observations on the closing comments made by Mr. Campbell and I think these will not take more than five minutes in total.

I would, sir, appreciate if you would be prepared to start after the lunch time adjournment for two reasons; firstly, we have just been given a copy of Mr. Gibb and Mr. Wilson's statements which I have not had time to study and, secondly in may be in fact I can make enquiries which may help on the Section 27 point.

LORD CULLEN: I am perfectly happy with that. We will rise now and resume at 10 to 2.

After an adjournment for lunch.

1.50 p.m.

LORD CULLEN: We will now resume. Mr. Scoggins?

MR. SCOGGINS: Thank you. Could I start by associating ourselves with all that was said yesterday by Mr. Bonomy and by others in their opening remarks. The shooting community in Great Britain numbers upwards of 1 million people, and is as affected as the rest of the population by the terrible events at Dunblane.

Sir, I am grateful for the invitation you have extended to assist the Inquiry, and I have very clearly in mind the terms on which the invitation was issued.

I think I can be brief. We have already lodged detailed written submissions, and I would confine my remarks to two areas, of which I think the first will be the most substantial: this will be matters which arose during the closing speeches of Mr. Gibb and Mr. Taylor and were explored further this morning, and I hope I can assist with some of these mysteries, as they sometimes are called; then also there were some observations made by Mr. Campbell in his own closing submissions. As a matter of courtesy, I have made Mr. Campbell aware of my comments, and I understand his position to be that he is content that I make them.

For the record, sir, I should tell you who I represent, because I do not represent all shooting organisations in Great Britain. In alphabetical order -- and purely in alphabetical order -- the Associations I represent are: The British Association for Shooting and Conservation; The British Field Sports Society; The Clay Pigeon Shooting Association; The Gun Trade Association; The Muzzle Loaders Association of Great Britain; The National Pistol Association; The National Rifle Association; The National Small Bore Rifle Association; The Shooting Sports Trust; and The United Kingdom Practical Shooting Association.

Sir, those Associations have a total membership of more than quarter of a million, and many more through affiliated clubs. Their interests cover/cover the spectrum of recreational shooting: target shooting, stalking and sporting, and historical and antiquarian interest in firearms.

If I could turn to a number of matters which arose during the closing speeches of Mr. Gibb and Mr. Taylor, I start with the collecting of firearms. I think the question came from you, sir, as to how collectors are dealt with under the "good reason" criteria.

Sir, there was up until the late 1980s some dispute as to whether collecting was a "good reason", particularly with regard to what we would call modern firearms, firearms for which ammunition remains freely available. The present position is now set out in the Home Office Guidance at paragraph 6.13. I won't take you through that; I leave you, sir, to read it for yourself. In essence, if someone can prove that they are a genuinely interested collector, that would be accepted as a good reason for possession.

Chief Constables are directed to regard each case on its merits. Normally if a collecting certificate is issued no permission will be given for the collecting of ammunition. There is also a statutory condition which must be attached to a collector's certificate under the Firearms Rules 1989, paragraph 3(4A). That was added in 1992, and remains in force. Effectively it provides that the gun can be kept as a collector's piece, but must not be fired or otherwise used as a firearm.

LORD CULLEN: It doesn't require to be disabled?

MR. SCOGGINS: No, it remains fully functional.

I draw your attention, sir, to the special exemption which is given to certain museums -- those listed in the Schedule to the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988.

LORD CULLEN: There may be some collectors -- and perhaps Mr. Penn is one of them -- who would like to try out their piece from time to time. What would happen in that event?

MR./

MR. SCOGGINS: In those circumstances the certificate would not be a collector's certificate. The collector would have to seek a variation to use his firearm and keep ammunition for it.

Could I now turn to the question of Home Office-approved clubs? Mr. Gibb suggested that a member of such a club, as provided in the Home Office criteria, could continue to shoot indefinitely without ever having to acquire or apply for a firearms certificate. That is indeed the position.

Section 15(1) of the 1988 Act provides in very simple terms that so long as a person is a member of an approved club and so long as the criteria for approval remain in force, then he may use firearms and ammunition at that club and in connection with shooting at that club as long as he wishes.

LORD CULLEN: I was thinking of someone who was not a member and who was not on the way to becoming a member.

MR. SCOGGINS: That was the next chapter I was coming on to, guest days and the guest days exemption.

Yesterday after the Inquiry closed Mr. Bonomy put to me a number of questions, and overnight I have done my best to answer them.

The current Home Office criteria has been in force since 1st January 1996, and that superseded all previous directions. I see you have got a copy there, sir. They are an implementation of criteria recommended by the Firearms Consultative Committee, which were implemented in 1991. "Guests" are permitted to shoot without having to produce a firearms certificate subject to certain restrictions, which you are able to read for yourself, and subject also to the local police being given at least 48 hours' notice of the intention to have a guest day. The number of guest days are restricted to no more than 12 per year.

The way in which this is done is that the "guests" can become a member for a limited period/period, a member of the club, and they are therefore entitled to exemption in the first place under Section 15 of the 1988 Act.

Mr. Bonomy raised with me the question: are these criteria valid? If one looks at the firearms legislation, although there is specific statutory power for the Home Secretary and the Scottish Secretary to make the rules, there is no power for the Home Office to issue criteria for the approval of clubs.

Now, sir, I caused enquiry to be made of the Home Office yesterday afternoon, and the Home Office say they consider the authority to issue those criteria arises in Section 15(2) of the 1988 Statute. Having read sub-section (2) I do not think it would be for me to comment whether I agree with that view or not.

All I would say is that the criteria have existed in some form or another since 1920, when the first Firearms Act was passed, giving restrictions on possession. These criteria were only made public after 1979, after the Hungerford incident, but they have been around for 75 years. I do not suggest they were invalid, but clearly these have to be validly issued. I do not want to develop that any further.

Mr. Bonomy also mentioned to me that whether those criteria would allow shooting by non-certificate holders or guests does depend on the interpretation of the word "member" in Section 15 of the Act. The view taken by the Home Office is that someone who arrives for a guest day and is properly supervised is treated as if they were a member, and that seems to be acknowledged.

Sir, unless you want me to go further into the abyss I do not propose to say anything more about that.

LORD CULLEN: Does this apply to all forms of firearms, rifles, handguns alike?

MR. SCOGGINS: It will apply to all these firearms which are within the approval of the clubs.

Could/

Could I turn then to the meaning of "opportunity of using", which appears in paragraph 6.8(e) of the criteria? Three interpretations of that phrase have been put to you. If I can try and reduce them to their minimum, the first of these is that the certificate holder or the applicant simply has to say "I can use the guns which I want or which I hold", depending on whether it is a grant or renewal or variation. In these circumstances the questions of past use and future intention are irrelevant, as I think is Mr. Taylor's case.

The second interpretation is "I can use and I intend to use those guns, and I intend to use the guns", perhaps in the sense of "I hope to be able" rather than "I have a settled intention". I am aware the word "intention" has more than one meaning as well. In those circumstances, past use remains irrelevant, but future intention is relevant.

The third possible interpretation is the one perhaps Mr. Taylor was, for understandable reasons, least willing to accept, and that is that the shooter has to say at a renewal "I have used my guns, I can use my guns, and I intend to use the guns". That is only relevant on renewal of a firearms certificate, if one is talking of good reason for the firearms certificate being renewed.

Sir, from our standpoint, which of those is the current interpretation is perhaps less important than what you may recommend for the future. I fully appreciate that the correct answer is a matter of concern to Mr. Taylor's own clients.

Sir, I do not propose to add anything to what Mr. Taylor has said. All I can say is that we from our own researches are not aware of any authoritative ruling on the meaning of these words. There may well be somewhere, perhaps in the bowels of LEXIS, but we have not come across it.

The important thing for this Inquiry is that it has highlighted differences of view in relation to those words even within Scottish Police Forces. Those differences are in our experience mirrored by the attitude of Police Forces in England and Wales.

So/

2.05 p.m.

So there is no consistency and I suspect if you put these three interpretations to the 51 Chief Constables to interpret, you would find that there is a division between the three camps.

Of course, sir, if you put the question after these tragic events the answer might perhaps be a bit different than it would have been before but I don't think that I would want to comment further on that.

Sir, those differences are, in our view, cause for grave concern. Whichever is the correct interpretation of the words as they currently stand, it seems to do no credit to the firearms licensing system that there should be even the possibility of inconsistent views on what they mean. There should be a consistent view throughout England and Wales and indeed throughout Scotland.

LORD CULLEN: Just remind me, we are talking about the interpretation of the guidance?

MR. SCOGGINS: The interpretation of the specific words "opportunity of using".

LORD CULLEN: Yes, and those words themselves come from the guidance? That is where they have been created?

MR. SCOGGINS: Yes, sir.

LORD CULLEN: Can you remind me, does the guidance itself rest on some statutory basis?

MR. SCOGGINS: Sir, it does not. It is not made under any particular statute.

LORD CULLEN: It is rather remarkable we are discussing something which has no statutory basis whatever.

MR. SCOGGINS: Sir, I can tell you that within the shooting community and I think the police will be familiar with this, if the Home Secretary or the Scottish Secretary wishes to change a guidance he sends a letter called a "Dear Chief Constable" letter and that effects the change. I will say more about/about that in a moment but it is not a statutory instrument and does not have the force of legislation.

Sir, the question of which of the three competing interpretations or views you favour is of course a matter for you but what we would say is that the question of past use and future intention should be relevant to the renewal of the certificate. Sir, we adopt the suggestion I think you yourself made that these should be considerations and not criteria and that each case should be treated on its own merits.

There are instances where people have not been able to use their guns for a considerable period. They might have been abroad for instance.

LORD CULLEN: Can I ask you one point that arises out of that. Talking about the future and talking about the middle of these three, the alternative one, concentrating on intention, if we assume that is to be the correct approach for the future, does that involve Chief Officers of Police in considering whether it is a genuine expression of intention? In other words, he might say "Well, I know that's what you say but I don't accept it for the following reasons".

MR. SCOGGINS: I think it does and I think it is in the same category as many other questions being put to an applicant where the answers are considered and the Chief Officer or whoever is investigating must reach a view on whether they are persuaded they are correct.

LORD CULLEN: The consequence of that I suppose is the Chief Officer of Police gets into questions of credibility.

MR. SCOGGINS: Yes, he might. Sir, I suggest he already has to do that in several other areas.

LORD CULLEN: So it is an administrative role but it might have a sort of quasi judicial function? - Yes, sir, and I understand what flows from that. That might perhaps depend on how the test is worded and how the investigation is conducted but I think, sir, those are/are matters for you and not for me.

Sir, can I just deal with how Home Office guidance can be amended and the usual procedure for amending it because one of the things which I know you are acutely aware of and conscious of is that if reforms are needed, they should be able to be done swiftly.

Sir, you have already mentioned correctly that the guidance does not rest on legislation and therefore to amend them there is no need for a statutory instrument. Sir, if I can tell you how amendments are normally made. The standard procedure is for the Home Office to draft the amending words. That draft is then considered internally within the Home Office and appropriate advice is taken from ministerial departments and thereafter, if appropriate, the Treasury Solicitor. When the Home Office is content with the draft, it is circulated, as I understand it, to representatives of the Association of Chief Police Officers in England and Wales and its counterpart in Scotland. It is circulated for comment, sir. It will also probably be sent for comment to the Firearms Consultative Committee. When the comments have been received, and depending clearly upon how substantial they are, the Home Secretary will then draft his "Dear Chief Constable" letter which will be sent to all Chief Constables in England and Wales and an equivalent letter will issue from the Scottish Office.

Now, sir, in our experience that process can take between three and six months. So we say it might be open to you, say it would be open to you to present in your report a form of words with which you were content and which would reduce the amount of consultation required.

Sir, you might also think it appropriate, and I think it within your terms of reference, that if this is a matter you do consider to be urgent, to issue an interim form of words so that the consultation process can begin at the earliest possible moment.

Sir, I would just re-confirm that I do not hold the instructions of either the Home Secretary or the Secretary of State for Scotland but just/just in our experience there may be ways of perhaps short-circuiting or accelerating what otherwise can sometimes be a lengthy process.

So that is all I say about the meaning of "opportunity of using" unless there are any other questions you have for me on that one.

Sir, can I grasp the nettle of Section 27 and the proviso. I don't want to raise your hopes by telling you I'm going to offer you an interpretation. It is really, sir, just to inform you that our researches have shown that the proviso in those terms has existed in legislation since at least 1937, when the 1920 Act was consolidated. I am not able to tell you whether they appear and if so in what form in the 1920 Statute, not currently able to tell you. But, sir, our researches have not shown any authoritative decision interpreting the burden of proof in that proviso.

Sir, I hesitate to try to look into the draughtsman's mind at a distance of two or three generations to see what was meant so again I would say rather what I said about the guidance to police officers and the Home Office criteria, that what may matter more is how these things are approached in the future rather than what they may have meant in the past.

LORD CULLEN: Before we turn to the future, I know Mr. Taylor's view was that on his approach it was rather questionable whether the proviso had added anything. He adopted a composite approach to it. I don't know whether that squares with your approach to it or not.

MR. SCOGGINS: One gets the impression reading Section 27 that it is an amalgam of a number of provisions which may have been drawn from other statutes. If one looks at, let's say, the question about unsound mind and intemperate habits and then adds the concluding words "or for any reason unfitted to be entrusted", there seems to be a slight problem there because one would have thought that unsound mind and intemperate habits are themselves reasons not to be entrusted.

LORD CULLEN: It does not even say "or otherwise".

MR./

MR. SCOGGINS: No, and it might be in that very last sub-sentence of the proviso perhaps it should say "or be for any other reason entrusted" but I think, sir, that is not only playing with words, it is tinkering with legislation.

The point I seek to make is not to try to give you an interpretation for the past because I don't think I can do that but to look at how these words could be approached in the future.

I would simply observe that if the burden of proof of not being of unsound mind and not being of intemperate habits were to be put on an applicant, it would require him to prove something of a negative.

LORD CULLEN: Well, I think Mr. Gibb was suggesting one might sort of split the thing into two parts.

MR. SCOGGINS: Yes, I am wondering whether it is appropriate perhaps to talk about a burden of proof at all because what one is considering here is a Chief Officer examining evidence in front of him. I think the burden of proof only comes into play when one has to look to whose job it is to collect the evidence.

LORD CULLEN: Of course, that may depend upon what information is put before the Chief Officer.

MR. SCOGGINS: Yes, indeed.

LORD CULLEN: And that of course may depend on what the future is, if there is a future, on matters of counter-signatories or referees as somebody suggested.

MR. SCOGGINS: Sir, I quite agree. I think the question is one of clarification. All I am saying is the words appear to have been there for the best part of.....

LORD CULLEN: I trust you are not asking me to draft or remodel Section 27?

MR. SCOGGINS: Certainly not, sir.

LORD/

LORD CULLEN: Because I think I have quite a few other things to do.

MR. SCOGGINS: Sir, I appreciate that.

Finally, sir, on this section of what I have to say, can I just point out to you, and you may already be aware, that the seventh report of the Firearms Consultancy Committee will be published tomorrow, the 11th July. If a copy has not already reached you, sir, I would expect it would reach you fairly swiftly through the Scottish Office.

I can tell you it does contain recommendations and comments touching on the events at Dunblane, including for instance the question of an Appeal Tribunal but, sir, I have not seen a copy of it myself and I can't tell you what else may be in it. So that concludes what I have to say about questions that arose during Mr. Taylor and Mr. Gibb closing.

Can I now turn, and I promise to be brief, to some observations made by Mr. Campbell in his own closing speech. Sir, Mr. Campbell suggested that there is a tension between the police duty to regulate firearms use and the pressure to provide what he described as "a level of service" to shooters. Mr. Campbell asked the question "Can we be sure that public safety will always be the paramount consideration?" (p.2926B). Sir, what we say to that is that even if that tension exists, it is not in any way unique to target shooting or regulation of firearms. There are many instances, sir, where regulators are put in that position in circumstances to do with public safety.

I mention simply three although I don't say it is a complete list. The Health & Safety Executive is in just this position in that it sees its job as not just enforcing and prosecuting but also advising and liaising. Sir, the Environmental Health Departments of various local authorities, we would say that such a tension exists there and the same would apply to the Environment Agency which is not just a police force for the environment but also has regular liaison with industry and commerce.

Sir, over and above that, I submit that the police function generally has to balance relations/relations and liaison with law-abiding people and the enforcement of the law against those who break it so if there was a level of service to be given by the police, it is to be given generally to the community.

Sir, what I say is that the point made by Mr. Campbell that this tension is perhaps something special and justifies the point which he makes, I say there is no support for that. It is not a unique feature. Even if there is such a conflict and you would consider it to be of concern, then the solution we would see is that the police must be firm but fair. The shooting community not only understands that but would positively welcome it.

That, sir, is a matter for the police but the police must understand shooters and I adopt the words of Mr. Taylor this morning. I hope I don't take them out of context. He said the emphasis was on co-operation with the shooting community. Sir, we would adopt and echo those words.

Sir, Mr. Campbell also suggested to you that the current system of firearms control which dates from 1920 developed at a time when guns were few in number in civilian hands and were mainly held for purposes such as gamekeeping and game shooting. Sir, he asked whether those laws perhaps did not suit modern times. You will find these comments at 2927A of the transcript, sir.

The/

The picture is there painted to you of few guns and no gun problem. But, Sir, that was not the position by any means.

In 1920, when the framework from which the current legislation derived its origin was being developed, there were vast numbers of guns in lawful ownership. Can I just remind you of the evidence of Mr. Penn (2630 to 2632), and the perhaps unexpected quote that Mr. Penn gave you from the Journal of Betatrix Potter in 1885?

Can I refer you also to several written submissions which describe the pre-1990 position, notably those of Mr. Greenwood, Mr. Mundy and Mr. Stevenson.

Sir, when the current framework was first devised some 76 years ago the practice of civilian target shooting was very widespread indeed. It had been fostered and encouraged in the early part of the century following the rather poor performance of conscripted soldiers during the Boer War.

It had been encouraged up to the First World War, and was encouraged long afterwards. So what I say is that Mr. Campbell -- and I understand his position -- Mr. Campbell would paint a picture to you of a society with few guns in civilian ownership. Sir, the position was if not entirely different, very significantly different from that.

Sir, Mr. Campbell also suggested the well-established link between licensed gun ownership and gun suicide, a point which was touched on by Mr. McEachran yesterday. I do not intend to say anything further than he did.

Mr. Campbell also suggested to you that the shooting community does itself few favours by refusing to accept change of any significance. He cited as leading examples the desire of shooters to keep weapons at home, and resistance to handloading of ammunition at shooting Clubs. The comments you will find at Page 2929 of the transcript.

A picture is painted to you there of a stubborn/stubborn gun lobby, but can I say that Mr. Campbell's comment overlooks the evidence on those two particular points.

As to home-loading of ammunition, considerations of safety were mentioned by two witnesses, Mr. Penn (2609E), and Mr. McCarthy (2581C).

Neither of those witnesses was challenged on what they had to say about the need for concentration and the importance of being able to load ammunition in circumstances where one is not distracted. Both of them talked about safety.

As to home storage of firearms, can I direct you to Page 41 of the submission made by the Association of Chief Police Officers of England and Wales, in which in terms they say that having considered the other options, they still remain of the view that home storage is preferable.

That was a view, Sir, which was repeated by the ACPO president, Mr. Sharples in his evidence to the Home Affairs Committee on the 8th May this year.

So, Sir, if Mr. Campbell is suggesting that the resistance to hand-loading at Clubs and resistance to giving up keeping guns at home are in some way unsupported by other -- and I would say "Other independent" -- evidence, then, sir, I would say he proceeds on a wrong premise. So that is not evidence of a stubborn gun lobby in any way.

Finally, Mr. Campbell suggested that there is a need to prevent a gun culture developing before the number of guns in licensed ownership puts that beyond reach.

Those comments you will find at Page 2932D. He was commenting on certain omissions, as he saw it, from the Green Book.

If I can refer you to the Green Book, and particularly Page 3, Paragraph 6, at which the Government evidence says it is thought that firearms ownership has fallen since the 1968 Act came into force.

As/

As I say, that is quite a mild and modest comment, but I would mention to you some figures.

If you look at the written submission of Mr. Jan Stevenson, which is submission No. 139 in the official Productions, he gives figures for firearms certificates on issue in England and Wales taken from the official statistics.

Sir, in 1968, just before the Firearms Act of that year came into force, there were 216,821 (sic) firearms certificates -- that is not shotguns -- firearms certificates on issue in England and Wales. By 1993 that figure had dropped to 138,400.

Sir, can I take you, to come more up-to-date, to annex A of the Green Book, in which the figures for firearms certificates in England and Wales and Scotland are said to be at the end of 1995 there were 174,020 firearms certificates on issue in England and Wales and Scotland combined. I am sorry, with the notice given I haven't been able to give you comparable figures for the whole country for these three dates I have given. But if you look at the Government evidence, and if one looks at the statistics, the net growth of firearms certificates year on year is less than 1 per cent.

So the point I make is that to say there is a growing gun culture and growing number of guns is perhaps not a good or justified statement.

Sir, even today the number of firearms certificates on issue is substantially lower than it was some 28 years ago.....

LORD CULLEN: Just remind me -- the figures you are quoting, are they certificates?

MR. SCOGGINS: These are firearms certificates on issue at the end of each of these years.

LORD CULLEN: Can one get to what the underlying number of weapons is?

MR. SCOGGINS: Sir, this is a very difficult task, because as has emerged in this Inquiry there is only one certificate no matter how many/many guns are on them. So what I would say is there is no evidence that I am aware of that the overall number of firearms has risen. But I would quite accept that the figures give us only certificates, that is people, they do not give us guns.

But I say even so the picture that Mr. Campbell paints for you is not one that is justified on the evidence.

Sir, in conclusion I simply say that the recommendations which you make in our view should be proportionate, proven by the evidence and practicable. Unless I can assist you further those are my submissions.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you very much Mr. Scoggins. That is most helpful. Thank you for responding to my invitation.

Now, there is one matter at this stage I would like to raise really for my own assistance, if I can receive any.

During your submission, Mr. Campbell, in support of your radical approach, you did make some reference to certain research material, and then I think Mr. McEachran yesterday referred to other material. If you have any response you would like to give me on that for my own benefit, I would like to have it before I embark on the task of looking at that material myself.

MR. CAMPBELL: Yes, thank you, Sir, for that invitation.

The passage in my learned friend Mr. McEachran's submission I think is at Pages 3026 to 3028, where he deals with the question of whether or not there is a link between gun availability and harm flowing from guns.

In reply, firstly in the Green Book itself, the evidence from the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Scotland, it makes reference in annex G, if I might invite you just to look at that annex for a moment. It is at Page 73 -- and note the authors of this work. This is a note by the Crime and Criminal Justice Unit of the Research Statistics/

Statistics Directorate of the Home Office. And the purpose of the work is to consider research done to see how far gun availability is linked to the level and nature of violent crime.

Sir, this would appear to be a review of the available academic work and a review carried out by an independent Government body.

Towards the foot of that page in the final paragraph the authors warn that much of the academic debate has often been ideologically cast, with some of the literature partisan, and thus more easily discounted.

In that regard, therefore, in my submission it may be that more than usual emphasis should be placed on the statistical material, and in particular the statistical material set out in the various figures and tables in this work -- for example, Figure 1 on Page 76, Figure 2 on Page 77 and Figure 3 on Page 78.

It is a matter for you, Sir, but you may conclude that the views of the authors of this document, flowing from the statistical material, are hard to refute.

For example, on Page 77 just above the Figure "2": "The overall picture indicates a strong statistical association between gun ownership and gun-related homicide".

Sir, a particular point was made by my learned friend Mr. McEachran in relation to the Vancouver/Seattle Study.

With regard to what he said, it is in my submission important to note, as recorded in annex G at Page 78, where reference is made to the Seattle/Vancouver study, that the reason that these two cities were chosen was because they were "very alike in terms of geography, climate, history, demographic and socioeconomic factors, all of which might arguably produce similar cultures of violence".

So contrary to what one might have understood yesterday from my learned friend, in fact these two cities were chosen specifically because it was thought that gun availability was the main, or at/

at least one very clear differentiating factor between them, and they were otherwise similar.

In this general context you have I think already had a reference to the evidence of Professor Cooke, but perhaps not the specific passages, and I would simply refer you to his evidence, for example Day 22 (2689) and Day 23 (2702), where he indicated that, in the context of methods of control, gun availability is the most obvious situational factor of importance.

So, Sir, where does this leave you with the task that you have on this part of the overall picture? Maybe the choice is to accept the conclusions of the independent review as trustworthy and reliable.....

LORD CULLEN: What do you mean by that -- do you mean this?

MR. CAMPBELL: The Green Book, yes.

LORD CULLEN: But that itself has been criticised, has it not?

MR. CAMPBELL: That itself has been criticised. I will come on to the criticism in a moment, but I do stress "independent" in this context, and independent in the sense of reviewing, one assumes -- and there is no reason to assume to the contrary -- the major academic work on the matter.

The choice is either to accept the conclusions of this work or alternatively to embark upon what one might think is a very difficult task of attempting to resolve the issue by reference to the other material before you, without the benefit of evidence and cross-examination, and without the benefit of all other relevant research studies over and above those relied upon by my learned friend, Mr. McEachran.

An alternative approach, which may come to the same thing, is having had regard to the material in the work by Mr. Stevenson and the others mentioned, that you may conclude that nonetheless there is no good or sufficient reason, in the absence of a much fuller examination of the issue, to/to reject the terms of the evidence laid before you by the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State, bearing in mind that it is not only the result of an independent review, of up-to-date research, it would appear to be plainly supported by the statistical information, and in my submission is also common sense.

LORD CULLEN: I had a recollection, which is not very fresh in my memory, that there was some suggestion that there was a figure used in this paper that could not be right.

MR. CAMPBELL: I think there was a mention of a decimal point in the wrong place?

LORD CULLEN: Yes. Can you remind me where it was, and if you have any comments on that point?

MR. CAMPBELL: I think from memory -- and I am subject to correction here, no doubt -- it is -- yes, it is under reference to, I think if one looks at Page 83 of the Green Book, the figure given in table A.1 for the homicide rate per 1 million of the population in Great Britain is given as 1.3, whereas at Page 79, albeit in the context of England and Wales only, in table 2 the average annual rate for all homicide is given as 11.3 per million of the population, and it was observed that there is a decimal point I think in the wrong place.

LORD CULLEN: So it should be?

MR. CAMPBELL: Well, I am not, I am bound to say, in a position to necessarily correct the Green Book here, because it is a little bit more complicated than that. I think I will try to find the passage in one of these works that deals with it.

I think there are some other points made in that regard. I think it is Mr. Stevenson.....

LORD CULLEN: I think I will come back to Mr. Scoggins in a moment to see if he can help us on that point.

MR. CAMPBELL: Yes. It is at Pages 9 and/and 10 of Mr. Stevenson's work, given at annex G.

LORD CULLEN: And what does he say is the correct figure?

MR. CAMPBELL: Well, what he says is "Page 79, table 2 states that the homicide rate in this country is 11.3 million. Turning to Page 83, however, we are told in table A.1 that it is 1.3 million, and in table A.2 that it is 6.7 million. One might have expected the research and statistics directorate to have noticed that table A.1 seems to suffer throughout from a misplaced decimal point. But even had that been correct, the variation between table 2 and table A.2 is enormous, and for the Home Office to have passed on a discrepancy of this magnitude without comment or explanation is emblematic of breathtaking insouciance".

It/

2.40 p.m.

It may be that rather than a misplaced decimal point that the figure 1 should be missed out.

LORD CULLEN: It should be 11.3 he is saying in Table 8.1?

MR. CAMPBELL: Yes. If one assumes that in Table 8.1 "Britain" is to mean England and Wales.

I am not sure that this matter raised by Mr. Stevenson affects the overall thrust of the argument.

So far as Mr. Stevenson himself is concerned, we know very little about him. Mr. McEachran told us nothing about him, and he doesn't say very much about himself and his work. No reference is made to any qualification in this area, but we do gather that he was a police officer in Alabama at one time. He is plainly part of the shooting community; that is obvious from his material, which is a long-argued case in support of the rights of shooters to retain arms.

Now, sir, despite what is said at page 9 towards the foot of the page to the effect that he does not intend to argue what he refers to as "the constitutional case", although he says "We believe strongly in the constitutional case", much of the document is an argument in favour of a right of civil liberty to possess arms, most notably in the section beginning at page 59, headed "Rights of Englishmen". It is not therefore in my submission a piece of academic research.

Sir, many passages raise questions as to the reliability or credibility of this piece of work, for example the passage at page 21 headed "Palaeolithic Politics", page 56, the chapter headed "Bolsheviks under the Bed" and other passages, such as page 17, which no doubt you will read for yourself.

The passage specifically relied upon by my learned friend Mr. McEachran at page 25, dealing with a quotation from a Professor Gary Kleck of Florida State University: that passage is a quote from/from an article in 1990, before much of the recent research set out in Annex G. it is a passage which amounts to mere assertion, although it may be that elsewhere in Mr. Kleck's work some detailed analysis is to be found, and it is a passage which in my submission is very hard to reconcile with the statistical data in Annex G.

There is a reference in Mr. Stevenson's work at page 27 to the Greenwood Study, and reference was made to Mr. Greenwood's submission to you. I note in passing, sir, from page 4, Note 17 of Mr. Mundy's submission that amongst other things Mr. Greenwood is a consultant to the Shooting Sports Trust. That perhaps should be borne in mind when reading his work.

The Study referred to by Mr. Stevenson at page 27 and the following page does not address the issue of whether there is a link between gun access and crime rate: rather it deals with a view on whether the legislation has failed to reduce the numbers of guns and gun crime, therefore the results do not justify the amount of police time which has been involved.

You, sir, can no doubt evaluate the merits of the approach suggested by Mr. Greenwood for yourself.

The only other specific passage raised by my learned friend Mr. McEachran was a comment made by a Mr. Sharples to a Home Affairs Select Committee at page 47 to 48. I do not consider it necessary to make any specific comment on that passage myself.

What I would say as far as Mr. Stevenson's work is concerned is that he has plainly gone to an enormous amount of time and trouble, and it would appear to be clear that guns play a dominant or at least a major role in his life and thinking.

So far as Mr. Greenwood is concerned, the specific passage referred to in his submission is No. 60, paragraphs 46 to 48 and paragraph 70.

Sir, I do not intend to take up more time than is necessary by going through these paragraphs/paragraphs: but putting the matter broadly, paragraphs 46 to 48 are dealing with the effects of the 1988 Act. These paragraphs do not address the issue or whether or not there is a link between gun access and harm flowing from guns; what they deal with is the trend in crime as against the number of certificates over a period of time in our society.

If we accept his figures as correct, the only lesson that can be drawn from that is that we now live in a more violent society.

Now, sir, society will change over time. It is the now that matters. What one requires is what one finds in the Green Book, namely a comparison between different but broadly similar communities or cultures in modern times, with differing levels of gun availability.

So far as paragraph 48 is concerned, the figures there are specific to shotguns. They do not address the critical question. Paragraph 70, to which reference was also made, does not deal with the matter of considering the use of firearms in homicide and lethal assaults. I do not propose to say anything further on that.

There is it is fair to say a section in Mr. Greenwood's work which does deal with the specific matter at hand. I do not intend to take up time dealing with that. You, sir, will no doubt read that matter in the context of everything else. Again, this document is an argued case; it is not an objective piece of academic work.

So far as Mr. Mundy is concerned, all we really know is that he lives in a place called Much Hadham in Hertfordshire. Again this is an argued case, not a piece of academic research. Sir, in conclusion, what much of this boils down to, so far as the material put forward by those and other gentlemen are concerned, is the view that so long as there are illegal weapons then gun crime will continue. That basic view underpins much of the material which we find in these documents.

That, sir, however fails to address the important question, in my submission: what about the Hamiltons of the world, who would not arm themselves from the criminal underworld? What about the/

the impulsive killer, what about the suicide and the extended suicide? The question of illegal weapons is wholly irrelevant to this. Similarly, one would wish to have regard to the overall benefits in time of reducing legal weapons, and thereby reducing the overall number of weapons in our society.

Finally, sir, it may be considered that the most cogent evidence of a link between legal gun ownership and violent crime is what happened at Dunblane on the 13th March, and earlier at Hungerford.

Sir, I appreciate this is potentially a big issue, and I am conscious that that perhaps will not have assisted you a great deal: but unless I can help you any further there is nothing more I would wish to say in relation to Mr. McEachran's remarks.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you very much for your assistance, Mr. Campbell; I am much obliged. Mr. Scoggins, can you help about the decimal point?

MR. SCOGGINS: I think if you study the submissions of Mr. Stevenson and Mr. Mundy you will find it is there explained. There is a problem with the transposition of figures from particularly the Canadian research.

LORD CULLEN: I was wanting to know if I have the means of resolving this particular point.

MR. SCOGGINS: You will find the arguments in the submissions.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you very much. Now, Mr. Bonomy, if there is nothing further, is there any other submission you wish to make?

MR. BONOMOY: I have a number of brief comments to make on matters arising from the other addresses.

First of all in relation to the position of Central Regional Council, I indicated on Monday that I accepted the factual content of the submissions handed to you by Mr. Jones, subject to clarification of certain matters. I can now tender to you a note of the two matters of fact which in my submission/submission ought to be added to the record of material in relation to Central Region. I do not propose to say anything further on that.

LORD CULLEN: Are these agreed or not?

MR. BONOMOY: No, these are my qualifications to what Mr. Jones has submitted. Otherwise I agree the factual content of his submission.

LORD CULLEN: Mr. Jones, do you want to add anything?

MR. JONES: I do not have any quarrel with what is being proposed, and to that extent there is not a disagreement about the material. I have not incorporated it into my submissions because part of it is from the perspective of Miss Renton, who gave evidence, and I considered that did not lie very easily with the Regional Council's perspective.

LORD CULLEN: Thank you very much.

MR. BONOMOY: The second matter I want to deal with is the question of the interpretation of Section 27 of the Firearms Act 1968. I do now have a copy of the Firearms Act 1920, and you will see that Section 27 appears as Section 1(2) of this Act, with certain differences. All the familiar expressions are there, but not quite in the same position.

Section 1(2) states: "A firearms certificate shall be granted by the Chief Officer of Police of the district in which the applicant for the certificate resides, if he is satisfied that the applicant is a person who has a good reason for requiring such a certificate", rather than a firearm, "and can be permitted to have in his possession, use and carry a firearm or ammunition without danger to the public safety or to the peace, and on payment of the prescribed fee: provided that -

- (a) a firearms certificate shall not be granted to a person whom the Chief Officer of Police has reason to believe to be a person who by this Act is prohibited from possessing, using or carrying a firearm, or to be a person/person of intemperate habits or unsound mind, or to be for any reason unfitted to be entrusted with firearms"; so the proviso is identical. There is some little difference in the main part of the Section, however.

The provision for revocation is sub-section (6) of Section I, which provides that "A firearms certificate may be revoked by the Chief Officer of Police of the District in which the holder resides if he is satisfied that the holder thereof is a person who is prohibited by this Act from possessing, using or carrying a firearm, or is a person of intemperate habits or unsound mind, or is otherwise unfitted to be entrusted with firearms".

Now, sir, I have come more and more to be of the view, listening to the other addresses, that there is no way of satisfactorily explaining what was in the mind of the person who drafted these provisions. One simple example is the use of the expression in sub-section (2)(a) "for any reason unfitted to be entrusted with firearms", and then in sub-section (6) the expression "otherwise unfitted to be entrusted with firearms", when in sub-section (6) the criteria are fewer than in sub-section (2). I don't know I can explain the logic of these two ways of addressing unfitness. I cannot begin to try to explain that. What I was endeavouring to say on Monday was that this may be an area that you will feel able to look at. I accept you have indicated this afternoon that perhaps that is a tall order in the circumstances arising out of this case, but I do suggest to you that if you do not feel that it is within your remit to look at it in detail, bearing in mind the various constraints upon you, nevertheless I would suggest it is at least an area that you might comment on as requiring urgent consideration.

LORD CULLEN: Certainly the substance of it is for me to consider, but I am not sure whether it is wise to become embroiled in drafting, which might cause embarrassment, because once it gets into the hands of those who know the system better than I will ever know it it might be discovered there are problems which have to be sorted out.

MR./

MR. BONOMO: I appreciate that.

So far as the Guidance is concerned, in paragraph 6.6 there is reference to the criteria which Chief Officers of Police should apply in exercising the discretion under Section 27(I), where three or four provisos are stated. There then follow a number of figures within 6.7 dealing with what might be said to be the positive criteria, the ones contained in the original body of the Section, good reason and whether permission can be given without danger to public safety or to the peace. No addition is made to this proviso, indicating a certain approach, encouraging the police to make enquiries into the positive elements but ignoring largely the other elements, suggesting these are matters to take account of only if they come to light, rather than going looking for them.

Going on to Section 7, which deals with the grant or refusal of shotgun procedure, it is stated "No certificate shall be granted or renewed if the Chief Officer of Police: (a) has reason to believe that the applicant is prohibited by the Act from possessing a shotgun; or (b) if satisfied that the applicant does not have a good reason for possessing, purchasing or acquiring one", and it goes on to suggest there is therefore a need to make further enquiries only when it comes to his notice that there are doubts about the applicant's reasons for possessing a shotgun: so where reason becomes a negative rather than a positive feature, it has been suggested to the police that they need not look very closely.

LORD/

3 p.m.

LORD CULLEN: That might fit in with the expression "reason to believe".

MR. BONOMOY: Indeed, I appreciate that but it also fits in with the structure of the two separate provisions.

Now, sir, on the question of good reason, we have perhaps paid little attention to the word "good" in all this debate and indeed the guidance may more concentrate on the reason element rather than the good reason element. I wonder whether, if one thinks about the test as being good reason which in itself involves a value judgment, that perhaps we see the nature of the conflict between the guidance and the statute.

Now, I have little else to say on this subject except two things. One, to recognise that the conflict which apparently exists between the Government's evidence on good reason in paragraph 55 and the guidance at paragraph 6.8 (i) suggests that there is no clear understanding of what is meant by good reason in this context or how indeed it should be established. Secondly, to say that you may well give consideration to this, that where a renewal is involved good reason should perhaps require at least, in relation to target shooting, current active club membership. In other words, current, regular engagement in shooting activity. I state that simply as a bare minimum requirement to establish the reason and whether it is a good reason is a matter then for evaluation by the Chief Police Officer.

Now, sir, it has never been my intention in making available or at least preparing a note on the law to present an exhaustive interpretation. The note was simply designed to identify areas that you may wish to look at and beyond that I do not now propose to go at this stage.

Can I turn now to the paper that was submitted by Miss Dunlop when she addressed you in relation to the involvement of the Procurators Fiscal. May I simply ask you to bear in mind certain factors when considering that issue. There are a number of these.

In/

In 1988, precognitions were obtained from witnesses. These are not available to the Inquiry. There were no specific injuries reported in respect of the children and there is apparently no evidence that Hamilton struck any child for other than disciplinary purposes. Constables Gunn and Duncan reported that the children were not in physical or moral danger as far as they could tell and Mr. Taylor has addressed you on the question of the attitude of the parents, which was far from uniform.

In 1991, when a child was allegedly assaulted, reference has been made to the obvious violent and bullying nature of the child. In that connection, may I also draw your attention to a report that appeared in today's THE HERALD newspaper at page 7 which is headed "Teacher Who Hit Problem Pupil Is Cleared". It involved a teacher slapping and punching a child on the face and head. At the end of that report the Sheriff told the accused "I may be criticised uphill and down dale for what I am going to do. From what I heard, you cracked in circumstances in which I would have thought many people would have cracked. I don't think it is right and proper that society, this Court, or the Education authority should overreact to this situation. The young lad seems to me to have been causing a lot of trouble and to have been the architect of his own misfortune. You will be given an absolute discharge with no stain on your character". I simply ask you to pay attention to it. I make no comment on it.

It of course goes without saying that sufficiency of evidence is not the sole criterion for a Procurator Fiscal. If you have before you the typed version of Miss Dunlop's submissions, can I ask you in certain contexts in it to have regard to certain other authorities. I don't intend to go through them but I will provide copies of them for you. In the paragraph "assault" on the first page, can I invite you, sir, to take account of the case of B v HARRIS 1990 SLT 208. That was a case to which Hamilton himself referred in a letter which is D51K dated 14th November, 1989 which he sent to Mr. McMurdo, in which he claimed that the Court of Session says parents may even belt their children. I invite you to look at the facts of the case of H v LEES and D v ORR which were the two cases under Section/

Section 12 of the Children and Young Persons Act where the convictions were quashed. I invite you also in regard to breach of the peace to consider CARDLE v MURRAY 1993 SCCR 170 and KAVANAGH v WILSON 1995 SCCR 693.

I also ask you to bear in mind, sir, that in relation to breach of the peace, and indeed any crime, the starting point is the actual behaviour and not the effect of that behaviour although the effect is obviously a very important element.

I think something was said also within Miss Dunlop's submission about a decision in 1993 not to prosecute. My recollection of the evidence is that in 1993 the only request was to apply for a warrant to search Hamilton's home.

Lastly at this stage, sir, the case of McLEOD v TIFFNEY, which is referred to in the second last page, may bear some scrutiny but of course it becomes largely irrelevant when one considers the fact that Mr. Cardle, for reasons which he explained, did not consider the additional material which had been obtained but it does, in my submission, appear to have been obtained in circumstances which would normally have prevented the Procurator Fiscal dealing with the case of Mr. Hamilton from considering that additional material.

Now, sir, I have a number of fairly minor comments to make on some of the addresses.

Certain things were said yesterday about Mrs. Haggart and about her failure to complain that Hamilton had threatened her with a gun on Inchmoan Island, albeit Mrs. Reilly referred to that. I mention just for the sake of completeness that you will find a reference by Mrs. Haggart to there being a rifle on the island (p.727E). It goes no further than that but it should be put in that particular context.

Reference was made by Mr. Taylor to the absence of evidence in some instances of the relationship between witnesses and Hamilton and one he referred to was Clive Woods. At page 450C-E questions were asked of Woods about whether Hamilton was a friend of his. He was asked the specific question/question "Did you consider yourself to be a friend of his?" and he said "Well, in different circumstances I would have said I was as friendly as I am with anybody. You know, I class him as a useful acquaintance. He was somebody who had been extremely useful in the past and therefore, yes, he was a friend. He wasn't a close friend. My friendship only really revolved around the shooting club".

LORD CULLEN: Just a small point; there has been some variation about the spelling of his name. Is it Wood or Woods? I have it noted here as being Wood but I have seen it as Woods.

MR. BONOMY: I think the only way I can answer that properly would be to check with him, sir, and I will do that.

LORD CULLEN: For the time being, you can assume I am treating it in the singular, Wood.

MR. BONOMY: Well, I will have it checked. Mr. Taylor also mentioned the absence of identified experts in physical education who had commented adversely on Hamilton's methods of running his gymnastic classes, apart from Mr. Boal. I draw your attention, sir, to the reference by Mr. Penman to a report done by a lady called Tricia Chillas who was the head of sport and leisure of Central Region (p.2035).

LORD CULLEN: That is one of your insertions, isn't it? One of the alterations?

MR. BONOMY: Well, this is in a different context but it is one of the insertions. I am dealing with it in an entirely different context now (pp.2035-2036).

May I refer also to the evidence of Mr. Sommerville from Fife Region who dealt with a report by Mr. Liddell (p.1723). Mr. Liddell was the organiser for physical education with Fife Region.

There was also mention by Mr. Taylor of the absence perhaps of evidence of what the current situation is where an application is being dealt with by Mr. Lynch. I think, sir, consideration of the evidence of Mr. Lynch (p.1324) and Mr. Mather (p.1079C-D)/

(p.1079C-D) would entitle you to draw the inference, precisely the inference that Mr. Taylor suggested, that is a matter of fact and that simply supports what he said but actually confirms that it is in the evidence.

Some reference was made a number of times in his submissions by Mr. Taylor to the failure of the Fiscal to apply for a warrant and that might leave the police or did leave the police thinking that there was no reasonable cause to suspect a crime had been committed. I simply remind your lordship that the test for applying for a warrant to search premises is first of all reasonable cause to suspect a crime has been committed and secondly reasonable cause to suspect that material relating thereto will be found at the locus of the proposed search.

Mr. Cruikshank invited you to look more closely at the evidence of Mr. Bell on this question of training for being a range officer (p.462). When you read it, sir, you will see that the training, although described as formal, is actually a question of picking up the procedure on the job and I see no reason to depart from what I said in my original submissions to you.

He also mentioned that there was no evidence that Hamilton was ever actually a member of Callander Rifle and Pistol Club. You see, sir, that on his very first application for a firearms certificate he refers to Callander Rifle and Pistol Club. Now, I quite accept that no one has come along and said "I was an official and recorded his membership" but that is just one of a number of bits of evidence which do point to his membership at an earlier stage of that club.

Reference was also made by Mr. Cruikshank to the effect of the European Directive in restricting the legislation. In Article 2, paragraph 1 of the Directive, it is provided as follows: "This Directive is without prejudice to the application of national provisions concerning the carrying of weapons, hunting or target shooting" and in my submission there is no inhibition on legislation in this area as a result of the European Directive.

Reference/

Reference has been made to the possible inaccuracy in the statistics in the green book. Sir, do you wish me to have this verified or are you taking other steps to do that because it does seem to be a point that should be clarified.

LORD CULLEN: I think it would be simpler if it was clarified officially. It is covered I think by inquiries I have already asked to be made. I don't think it has been covered by any response received so far but I shall certainly press that point. I would rather go back to that particular source as well as taking into account any other comments made.

MR. BONOMOY: Well, I will take no action unless asked to do so.

My computer source tells me that Mr. Wood is Wood and therefore you can rely on that name.

I think in view of all that has been said over the last two days where there have been contentious issues debated, the public ought to know that the staff, pupils, School Board members and the Parent Teachers Association have indicated praise for the work of Central Scotland Police on the 13th March and subsequently. That does not mean to say they have not got their critics, I don't suggest that for a moment, but I think it right to indicate to the Inquiry that there is no reason for the public to have other than full confidence in Central Scotland Police and their present work.

LORD CULLEN: I see there is a letter from the Board which is an appendix to the submission that was made this morning.

MR. BONOMOY: Yes, there are two letters there. One from the head teacher and one from a spokesperson from the School Board. I think from the School Board and the Parent Teacher Association.

LORD CULLEN: Yes, you are quite right.

MR. BONOMOY: And these were written about two weeks or so after the 13th March.

LORD CULLEN: The one from the Board is dated/dated 27th March and the other one is the 29th.

MR. BONOMOY: Yes, and in fairness, Mr. Campbell has already made it clear in the context of his submissions that those whom he represents have nothing but praise for the work and in the aftermath following the events of the 13th and the support that they have been given. I simply make this remark in case sight is lost in the debate that is taking place here of the fact that there is no reason to have other than full confidence in the local police force.

Sir, the evidence has been led in accordance with Parliament's remit. The circumstances leading up to and surrounding the events at Dunblane Primary School on the 13th March have been investigated speedily and thoroughly in accordance with Parliament's wish that this should be done as a matter of urgency.

On behalf of all the parties I wish you well in your deliberations on the many difficult issues raised in the evidence and the submissions. All appearing before you have tried our best to assist you in your task. Of course, the ultimate responsibility for deciding what action to take in the future rests with Parliament and it is appropriate therefore to say finally that we recognise that our legislators will have hard decisions to take, requiring good sense and sound judgment in large measure.

LORD/

3.20 p.m.

LORD CULLEN: Just one or two matters I would like to deal with at this stage. First of all, I think there has been circulated a list of proposed corrections, and I suspect that list of itself has now been passed by the parties. But I have received today some further suggested corrections relating to the transcript yesterday, and it may be that parties would like to see that list, and indeed to review the transcript concerning the oral submissions to make sure that there are no corrections remaining in the transcript that perhaps should be drawn to my attention.

So what I would suggest is that parties could submit any corrections they want to make in regard to the transcript -- that is to say the transcript concerning the oral submissions that have been heard over the last few days, and to do that to the Inquiry Office in Edinburgh.

In that connection I should remind you that with effect from the 12th of this month the office will be rehoused in Edinburgh at Parliament House, and the full address and telephone number and fax number can be obtained on application to the office today.

There are one or two final matters I would like to deal with, but before I do that I think I would like to rise for a few minutes so that certain arrangements can be made. I shall resume in a few minutes' time.

After a short adjournment:

LORD CULLEN: I am going shortly to bring the Inquiry, that is to say the public aspect of it, to an end; but before I do so I want to say a few words on behalf of myself and the staff who are working directly with me.

It, I hope, will be obvious there is a considerable amount of planning and arranging that requires to take place to enable an Inquiry such as this to be set up. A great deal of work had to be done, not by myself in this respect, but by others, in order to make sure that the appropriate physical facilities were set up and were set up at the right time/time to provide the right kind of accommodation for anybody who in any way would be involved with this Inquiry.

I would like to record my sincere thanks to the Scottish Courts Service, and in particular their Property Services Unit for all the work they did in this respect to accommodate the participants, the public and the Press. So far as I know what they did has been well received, and I think they are to be warmly thanked for that.

So far as our facilities on a day-to-day basis are concerned, I would also like to thank Stirling Council in a number of respects, in particular -- without wanting to single out too many individuals -- the hall manager, Mr. Martin Dickson and his staff for all the help that they gave so willingly at every stage so as to enable this Inquiry to proceed in the way it has done; and also the Social Work Department for all that they have contributed to this, in making matters run so smoothly and so helpfully, including I think the provision of an in-house creche, which I have never seen, but certainly it seems to have gone off quite well.

Also to the caterers for the way in which they made the cafe available, including at times which are not the normal times of opening.

We have had the benefit of the police and security officers, and we have also had the benefit of the Scottish Office Information Directorate, the latter handling the flow of information to the Press. I thank them all for the way in which they have made matters so straightforward.

So far as the setting of the Inquiry itself is concerned - and you appreciate I am now moving out into the arena here -- I would like to record my gratitude to those who have attended to making sure that we could hear what is said and that when necessary we could have documents and other things displayed.

I must also thank the shorthand writers and the bar officer, Bert White, and the two production officers, who have been ready to cope at the/

the last moment with some unexpected documents which appeared from the middle of nowhere.

That point reminds me of the way in which matters have had to be put together in some respects at the last moment, because a great deal of material was available, and from that a selection had to be made very much at the last moment. That called for a great deal of expedition and tolerance on the part of those concerned.

Turning to the parties and to the Crown, I owe a great debt of gratitude to all of them for the way in which they have helped this Inquiry to proceed with the clarity and expedition with which it has.

I have welcomed at every stage their very co-operative attitude, for which I am very grateful, because it has managed to enable me to get through a large amount of material within a comparatively short space of time.

The heaviest burden I suppose has fallen upon the Crown, and I am particularly grateful to Crown counsel and to the Procurator-Fiscal and his staff for the way in which they have shouldered that extremely heavy burden.

I will not leave out of account the unseen multitude who have submitted written submissions to me. They will all, of course, be considered and evaluated when I have the appropriate time to do so, but I am most grateful for the large response which I have received in regard to the topics upon which I invited those written submissions.

That leaves me now with my task, which is a very heavy responsibility, but it is nothing less than the subject matter deserves. I am most grateful for all the help that I have received, and the task now transfers to me to consider everything that I have heard and consider everything that I will be reading or have read, and in due course to produce a report that I hope will measure up to the responsibility which is entrusted to me. Thank you all very much.

The Inquiry then terminated.
